DFATHAM, N. B. - - AUGUST 19, 1886 An Interesting Timbor Case.

We gather from a report in the Timber Trades Journal of 31st ult.

On the 15th May, 1879, Messrs. Churchill & Sim proposed to Messrs. Guy & Co. that they should purchase between 11,000 and 12,000 standards of Baltic timchants, dealt almost ent rely in American timber and had no experience in the Balt't's, which was a branch of the timber business entirely distinct from the American trade; and this transaction was proposed by Churchill & Sim as a speculation in timber, which had at that time not been shipped. In the subsequent year, before the timber had arrived in this country. Churchill & Sim came to Guy & Co., and proposed that they should sell the whole of the timber included in this contract at a small profit, and acting on their advice Guy & Co. agreed to do so. It had, however, recently appeared that Churchill &

Guy & Co. agreed to do so. It had, however, recently appeared that Churchill & Sim took upon themselves to act as agents for both parties, and to sell the timber to a Mr. Mills, who had carried on business as Smallfield, Mills, & Neame. At that time Mills, who had been unfortunate in his speculations in timber, owed Churchill & Sim about £20,000, and in particular on an account between them, called the Baltic account, he owed them unwards of that they should sell it for him, keeping it under their own control, and thus pay themselves; and, though acting as agents of other parties, they persuaded, or advised, Messr., Guy & Co. to sell the times of the control of the con r without disclosing to them that they tended to sell it to Mills, who was their nestor, for the purpose of recouping them selves, the amount of their lebt, and that, in fact, it was a sale for their own bene it. Sir Horace Davey said he would prove that Mills was quite insolvent; had no means of raying the debt he owed.

had no means of raying the debt he owed, and which was represented by bills that had been renewed from time to time and had been running more than a year, and Churchill & Sim had no means of compelling payment. The plaintiffs' suggestion, therefore, was, that knowing from their experience of the Baltic trade that the price was abeut to rise, they made this contract for their own benefit. The timber was sold for a price which realized a profit of £22,000; at all events, upwards of £20,000. They repaid themselves the debt which Mills owed them, and there was a small balance, which they handed over to Mills. It appeared to the plaintiffs that Churchill & Sim took upon themselves to act for both parties, and their contention was either that it was right for ontention was either that it was right for nem to advise Messrs. Guy & Co. to sell, n which case they ought to have given hem the full benefit of their advice, and purchase and sale to Mills might for the purposes of the account between Guy & Co. and Churchill and Sim be treated as a last of acce the realities of doing evil are some of the principal reasons which Guy & Co, for the whole profit which was derived from the ultimate sale of the nature of the transaction with Mills genuine railway people it would not be was as set forth by Sir Horace, but so easily set braying by the bogus ones who had preceded me had taught them it was held by the presiding judge that the plaintiffs' case charged an offense of a more serious nature than the evidence seemed to sustainthat the charge of fraud against the defendants was not proved. The court therefore dismissed the action without prejudice to any other case that plaintiffs might be advised to Fishing Gazette shows that, on the Maine De you not every day see the old man bring in respect to any breach of

If they had reason to believe, from their experience of the trade, that the price would rise, and that it would be profitable to themselves and Mr. Mills to purchase this timber, they should have given Guy & Co. the benefit of this advice. The learned counsel said he was not give both parties, but if he did he put himself in a difficult position, and was bound to give both vendor and purchaser the benefit of his advice, assistance, and experience in the matter; and what the plaintiffs asked was that the so-called purchase and sale to Mills might for the Dominion Government when it
