"Yes," blandly; "that exactly illustratesmy idea.

"You think, then, he duslikes me?"
says Lilian, raising herself, the better to examine her companion's features, while a sense of thorough amusement makes itself felt within her.

"Dislike"—apologetically—"is a hard word. And yet at times I think so. Surely you must here noticed how he avoids you wow he declines to carry out argument commerced by you."

"I blush for my want of sensibility," says Lilian, meekly. "No, I have not noticed it."

"Have you not?" with exaggerated surprise. "I have."

At this inopportune moment Guy enters the room.

"At this inopportune moment Guy enters the room."

"The says Lilian, missing herself, the better to schools—she told me so—and here he is again!" says Lilian, in a new-struck tone. "There must be something in it. As you say, he really seems bent on business of some sort; perhaps he is some—"

"With a new chant, as I'm a sinner," says Chetwoode, with a groan. "Let us go into the library: the baize and that large screen stifle sound."

"No, to Propoge! I mean: there is a curiobs look about him as if, if—"

"He was going to execution?"

"No, to Propoge."

"In the squite the same thing."

"I hear his step." says Lilian, hurriedly, flinging open the window, "and hers, too!

"She also said that for that reason you dislike me!" The words are uttered quietly, but somehow tears have gathered in the violet eyes.

"Dislike!" exclaims her lover, the very faint symptoms of distress upon his darling's face causing him instant pain. "Lilian! how absurd you are! How could such a word come to be used between us? Surely Florence must know—has not my mother told you?" he asks, _has not my mother told you ?" he asks, turning to Miss Beauchamp a look of

"I know nothing," replies she, growing a shade paler. At this moment she does know, and determines finally to accept, when next offered, the devotion Mr. Boer has been showering upon her for the past two months. Yes, she will take the past two months. Yes, she will take him for better, for worse, voice, low church tendencies, and all. The latter may be altered, the former silenced. "I know nothing," she says; "what is it?" "Merely this, that Lilian and I are going to be married this summer. Lilian, of your goodness do not contradict me, in this one matter at least," bending a tender smile upon his betrothed, who returns it shyly. returns it shyly.

"I confess you surprise me," says Florence, with the utmost self-possession, though her lips are still a trifle white. "I have never been so astonished in my life. You seem to me so unsuited—so but that only shows how impossible it is to judge rightly in such a case. Had I been asked to name the feeling I believed you two entertained for each other, I should unhesitatingly have called

"How we have deceived the British Public!" says Guy, laughing, although at her words a warm color has crept into his face. "For the future we must no 'dissemble.' Now we have shown our selves up in our true colors, Florence, you will I hope, wish us joy."

"Certainly, with all my heart," in a tone impossible to translate: "my only regret is, that mere wishing will not insure it to you."

Here a servant, opening the door, informs Miss Beauchamp that Lady Chetwoode wishes to see her for a few

"Say I shall be with her directly," returns Florence, and, rising leisurely, she sweeps, without the smallest appear ance of basic, from the room.
Then Lilian turns to Sir Guy:
"How curiously she uttered that last speech! almost as though she hoped we should not be happy. I am sure I am with the description of the state of the s

"She was not earthu lastic in her con gratulations, I adjust. But that need not affect us. I am not proud. So long as you want to marry me, I shall be quite content."

"Lilian's reply, being wordless, need not be recorded here."

"Spiteful thing," remarks she, present ly, apropos of the spotless Florence.

"Pool Boer!" replies he.

"You think she will marry him?" heavily, and most unflatteringly, emphasized.

"I do."

"Poor Florence!" returns she. "When, I think that I can forgive her all her sins. Drenffal man! I do hope she will make his life a burden to him."

"I am sure you will five to see one hope fulfilled. Though I dare say he has a better chance of peace in the years to come than I have: Florence, at all events, does not go about boxing people's—" "Guy," says Miss Chesney, impera-tively, laying her hand upon his lips, "if you dare to finish that sentence, or if you ever refer to that horrible scene again, I shall most positively refuse to marry—Oh!here is Mr. Boer. Talk of marry—Oh!here is Mr. Boer. Talk of somebody! Look, it is he, is it not?" Standing on tiptoe, she cranes her neck eagerly, and rather flattens her pretty nose against the window pane in a wild endeavor to catch a glimpse of Mr. Boer's long-tailed coat, which "hangs" very much "down behind," before it quite disappears in a curve of the avenue. Presently it comes to view again from behind the huge laurustinus bush, and

"Yes, it is he." says Guy, staring over his betrothed's head, as he catches the first glimpse. "And evidently full of purpose. Mark the fell determination in "Yes," blandly; "that exactly illus-rates my idea. purpose. Mark the fell determination in his clerical stride."

"She saw him this morning at the enters the room.

"Ah, Guy," says Lilian, quietly, "come here. I want to tell you something."

He comes over obediently, shadly, and stands by her chair. It is a low one, and he leans his arms upon the back of it.

"Florence has just said you hate being contradicted," she murmurs, in her softest tones.

"If she did, there was a great deal of truth in the remark." he .nswers, with an amused laugh, while Florence glances up triumphantly. "Most fellows do, eh?"

"And that I am the one that generally contradicts you."

"I hear his step." says Lilian, hurriedly, flinging open the window, "and hers, too! She must have seen him coming, and run to meet him with open arms. Not for worlds would I spoil sport, op put them in a "tender taking.' Let us fly." Stepping out of the balcony, she turns to glance back at him. "Will you follow me" she asks, a certain arch sweetness in her eyes.

"To the end of the world!" returns he, eagerly, and together, hand in hand, they pass out of sight.

contradicts you."

"That is only half a truth. If she had said who already contradicts me, it would have been a whole one."

Lilian rises. She places her hand lightly on his arm.

"She also said that for that reason you dislike me!" The words are uttered
