moment's notice to sweep the harbor from side to side, commanding all the shipping and the wharves, and the entrance to the port. The town itself does not appear to good advantage from the citadel; all that you can thoroughly admire is the beauty of its situation, you can count some fifteen spires or towers of churches from this spot, and see at least five large new School Houses.

At the north of the city are the Wellington Barracks, where more than 1000 soldiers can be very comfortably quartered. A little further south is the

where the Admiral on the station is "at home" in summer. Coming down Gottingen Street we see the old Ladies' Home, an institution where about 40 old friendless ladies are kindly cared for. The institution for the Deaf and Dumb also is on this street, and will richly repay a visit. For efficiency it will compare with any school in America; but the building is humble enough in size and looks. Still nearer to the Citadel is the new Military Hospital, the best in America, and one of the largest.

South of the Citadel we see the Poor House,

a big brick palace, the City Hospital, the Asylum for the Blind and the Convent of the Sacred Heart. Bordering on the "North West Arm" are a number of fashionable residences. Here too, rises a noble monument of public philanthropy, the Industrial School, where there is accommodation for a hundred boys. Following down the course of the "Arm" we see much to admire in the houses, the fields, the shady avenues through well-kept forests, the blooming gardens, the pastures where herds of cattle graze in peace. By and by we come to the remains of old French forts, to relics of centuries ago, and to forts of the newest build, armed with guns of the largest calibre and newest pattern, magnificently situated and strong as the art of man can make them. On higher ground, rising from the bare rock,
