Jones.—You know, there are not so many days in the spring as in the other seasons, as forty of the days are lent.
Brown.—By George, that's a good one; I'll spring on Smith.
Smith.—Hello, Brown, what's pleasing you so?
Brown.—A good one that Jones just got off. He said spring was shorter than other seasons, as forty of its days are rented. Somehow, 'ou'd you know, that doesn't sound just as it did when Jones told it.

A working man with a dinner pail in his hand came out of a little shop, and met a fellow working man.
"Why, Jim," exclaimed the passerby; "you're working overtime now, ain't you?"
"No, was the reply. "I'm not."
"Ain't you putting in over eight hours a day?"
"Yes."
"I thought eight hours was the a'm schedule?" remarked the outsider.
"Yes; but you know I've bought the shop."

Dr. Lee's Pleasant Worm Syrup is sure death to the worms every time, but harmless to the most delicate child. It contains its own cathartic, so there is no need of giving castor oil or other purgative afterwards.

"Yes, the case of nerves."
"What's that?"
"Well, to be frank, it's the name we use when a wealthy patient is just plain cranky."
A Sustaining Diet.
These are the enervating days, when, as somebody has said, men drop by mistake as if the Day of Fire had dawned. They are fraught with danger to people whose systems are poorly sustained; and this leads us to say, in the interest of the less robust of our readers, that the full effect of Hood's Sarsaparilla is such as to suggest the propriety of calling this medicine something besides a blood purifier and tonic—say, a sustaining diet. It makes it much easier to bear the heat, secures refreshing sleep, and will without any doubt avert much sickness at this time of year.

A doctor prescribed rest and change for a small girl, saying that her system was quite upset. After he had gone, the little girl said, "I knew I was upset, mamma, because my foot's asleep, and things must be pretty bad when you go to sleep at the wrong end."

London's Great Cathedral.

A writer in the New York Evening Post referring to the architecture of recent years in London says—

"But the architectural work beside which nearly everything else in modern London seems dull and common is the unfinished Roman Catholic Cathedral in Westminster. Erected for the most part in brick, and erected within out-leath of the time which has usually been spent on the rearing of a cathedral, it nevertheless promises to rank with the greatest buildings in Christendom. Unlike the Liverpool Anglicans, who are about to begin their cathedral in the old world Gothic style, the Roman Catholics have piled up a basilica which, although a student would call it Byzantine, is so vividly conceived as to prove that the modern architect is not bound to speak in a dead language after all. It proves that he can be a living tongue and express the religious feeling of the twentieth century as clearly as the architect of Salisbury gave visibility to the emotions of the thirteenth. This week has given London the opportunity of judging the new building under proper conditions, for, although the dedication was not to have taken place for some considerable time, the cathedral has been unexpectedly opened by the singing of a requiem Mass over the body of Cardinal Vaughan. With hundreds of priests and monks in a huge temporary sanctuary that has been formed within the easternmost bays of the nave, and with rows upon rows of bishops and mitred abbots in the sanctuary proper, it could be seen that the English Roman Catholics have got what Cardinal Manning as well as Cardinal Vaughan yearned to give them—a cathedral of the metropolis equal in dignity to the minsters of Canterbury and York, and better adapted than either to the performance of the Roman ritual in full sight of a great multitude. It will be remembered to the credit of the architect that, disdaining the fashionable or academical architects of the day, and rising superior to the pettifogging method of a competition, he laid his finger upon the one master builder who was big enough for the work, and that, having found him, he gave him practically a free hand. Both Bentley, the architect in question, and Vaughan, who gave him the chance of his life, are dead; but by architects at least they will not be forgotten.

"For want of a clear space across which to view it, the west front of the basilica with its cupolas and balconies at present appears rather fussy. Seen from the east, however, nothing could be nobler than the whole composition, and its four low domes, graceful spire, and soaring campanile. But it is for the interior that Bentley's work is becoming famous.
"During the building of the shell, Bentley's design was neglected by architects and gazed at by the public, who called the campanile a chimney stack and the building itself a railway station. So completely, however, has it asserted its merits that in a recent competition among architectural students every one of the ninety competitors was found to have based his design for a church on Bentley's. Before long, second and Byzantinism and Bentleyism will probably become as great a nuisance as the old second-hand Gothic; but the over-working of fashion will not destroy Bentley's title to be considered the greatest English architect since Christopher Wren."

The Jews and Other People.
Referring to the agitation in behalf of the persecuted Russian Jews, the New World says that it is proper enough that it should continue, yet, most decidedly the Jews are not the only persecuted people in the world. "We have referred before," says our esteemed contemporary, "to the case of the religious orders in France, which does not seem to excite much pity in this country. If they were Jews they being traced out of their own homes there would be pages of clamor in certain of the great dailies. The wise would be working with hope of exciting the sympathy of all living men. The world will not soon forget the Drayfus episode. Yet look back barely a generation before Lord Xill, ascended the chair of Peter the Catholics of Russia were treated quite humanely as are the Jews today. From 1875 to 1879, the lives of Russian Catholics were miserable indeed. A number were killed outright, and thousands whipped with terrible lashes at the hands of merciless Cossacks, in an effort to force them to conform to the State religion. Sixty thousand converts were announced in one year by the Russian Orthodox church—60,000 under the sting of the lash. Of course they did not stay Orthodox. They became Catholic again at the first opportunity, yet whoever expressed a word of sympathy for them at the time because of their burdens? Several leading dailies even seemed to think that the Czar's government had a right to do as it pleased with its own people. The Jews have suffered in Russia, no doubt, yet it is a big question that only a few years ago the Catholics of that country underwent persecution quite as disgraceful."

Items of Catholic Interest.

It is a widespread error that M. Combes is an ex-priest, that he once received holy orders and belonged to the Catholic clergy. The truth is that M. Combes never received any ordination whatever, not even the tonsure, but because at one time he wore the cassock, as a student of the great seminary at Albi, he is called "Abbe" after the French fashion. He was born on Sept 6, 1835, of poor parents, at Roquecourbe, in the south of France. The good parish priest gave in his leisure hours Latin and Greek lessons to the poor but not untalented boy. On the recommendations of this good priest the boy was afterwards received gratuitously in the small seminary of Castres. Afterwards in the great seminary at Albi he was received gratuitously. Through the kindness of the Assumptionist Fathers at Nîmes, he was appointed professor at their small seminary. Later he offered the hospitality of the Carmelite Fathers at Paris, who put him in a position to continue his studies at the University of Paris, where he obtained his licentiate.

It is difficult to say, remarks the "London Catholic Times," how far the threats of the anarchists against Cardinal Rampolla, of which the Italian Government have had information, are seriously meant, but the civil authorities are undoubtedly to be commended for having placed His Eminence under police protection. The Cardinal himself is utterly free from fear. When warned of the peril by the Prefect of Police, and even by his ecclesiastical colleagues, he merely said that he had duties to discharge and did not intend to shirk them. What the anarchists or any cause or person would gain by the Cardinal Secretary of State to become one of the anarchist's victims is not easy to imagine. Another ecclesiastic would take his place and carry on his work. But, unfortunately, the senselessness of a crime is no argument that anarchists may not attempt to commit it. The bare fact of occupying a position of such moral eminence and so frequently condemning violations of law and order may be sufficient to arouse their direct hostility against Cardinal Rampolla. Mgr. Affre, Archbishop of Paris, was shot down whilst trying to restore peace in 1848, and against Archbishop Darboy, who was assassinated by the Communists in 1871, no other charge could be preferred than that he had served God as a worthy priest.

The publication of the Yellow Book, containing the correspondence between the French Foreign Office and the Vatican with regard to the Law of Association, is of immense interest, and its contents have caused quite a sensation, writes the Paris correspondent of the "London Monitor and New Era." This Yellow Book throws an interesting light upon M. Waldeck-Rousseau's objects in introducing the Association Law, and, to my mind, shows that he did not deserve the reproach to which he was so lavishly treated at the time in Catholic circles. M. Waldeck-Rousseau was a moderate man, a straightforward politician and a keen lawyer. A conclusion of the Drayfus affair saw that the unwise attitude adopted by certain congregations which aimed at playing a political role had so embittered a certain section of Parliament that unless he took upon himself to introduce a bill dealing with the religious orders the Radicals would bring forward a very radical measure indeed, of which Parliament might approve. He hoped to avert this by bringing in a moderate measure. At the same time he wanted to recall the position of the congregations who had persistently neglected to secure the subscription which, under the Concordat, they are bound to secure, and who, by relying mainly on official tolerance, left themselves at the mercy of political arbitrariness. This is plain not only from the correspondence with the Vatican, but from the text of the law itself, which M. Combes has broken wherever he could and which he has had altered by its majority when it was too plain to break it. The time for the general elections came as soon as the law was passed, and M. Waldeck-Rousseau found himself at the head of a new majority who were much too advanced for him. After negotiations with the various groups he saw that the majority were bent on expelling the religious orders, which he did not want, and as he could not follow them he resigned. He has been described as a man who let loose the dogs of war and afterwards ran away. As a matter of fact, he will ultimately be recognized as a moderate politician who endeavored to prevent a great crisis which he saw near at hand, and who quietly withdrew when he felt he had failed.

Among those who were recently presented for degrees at the University of London was the Rev. H. J. Irwin, S. J., of Stonyhurst College, who has carried off the crowning honor of the doctorate of literature. For this he has been preparing by a brilliant career at the university, of which he was already a double M. A. in classics and philosophy. His further studies were in the direction of economics, and the work which has won for him the D. Lit. is an essay on "Usury." Out of some dozen who have achieved a like success at the University of London Stonyhurst has claim two, the second being Father Michael Maher, whose work as a psychologist is long established as a standing authority.

The fiftieth anniversary of the solemn ordination of His Lordship Bishop Cameron, of Antigonish, fell on Sunday last, feast of St. Anne; but the celebration thereof was deferred till today, Wednesday. The Casket of last week thus refers to the event:

Certain the external pomp and ceremony that would have attended the celebration, such as band music, etc., will be suppressed in token of mourning for the Holy Father. The procession will start from the Bishop's house at 9:30, and passing by St. Bernard's Convent along St. Ninian's street will enter the Cathedral grounds by the main gateway, in the following order: (1) different branches of the C. M. B. A.; (2) clergy in birettas and surplices; (3) visiting prelates. Pontifical High mass will begin at 10 o'clock, the Rev. Father Jubilian being the celebrant, Assistant Priest the Very Rev. Alex. McDonald, D. D. V. G., Rev. Dr. Thompson, Dacon, and Rev. H. P. McPherson, Subdeacon. At the Gospel the Rev. Father Doherty, S. J., will preach, and at the end of the Mass an address will be presented to his Lordship on behalf of clergy and laity. At 6 p. m. there will be services at the Cathedral consisting of the Te Deum followed by Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament. For the morning services admission to the Cathedral will be by ticket. Citizens of the Town are preparing to signalize the event by setting up suitable decorations. Some twelve Bishops are expected, including three Archbishops.

An Ancient Foe
To health and happiness is Scrofula as ugly as ever since time immemorial. It causes hunches in the neck, disfigures the skin, inflames the mucous membrane, wastes the muscles, weakens the bones, reduces the power of resistance to disease and the capacity for recovery, and develops into consumption.
"Two of my children had scrofula seven years ago, and kept growing deeper and kept them from going to school for three months. I began giving them Hood's Sarsaparilla. This medicine caused the sores to heal, and the children have shown no signs of scrofula since." J. W. McKenna, Woodstock, Ont.
Hood's Sarsaparilla will rid you of it, radically and permanently, as it has rid thousands.
