CHAPTER XII.

APPROACHING SHADOW SEEN AND FELT-HELEN'S FEAR AS SHE ENTERS THE

She passed her cold hand over her clammy brow, and set herself by mental reflection to the task which she deemed so easy. But somehow as her mind went back on the year's which were gone she found here and there room for faint but growing doubt. Things which taken by themselves amounted to little, yet when added together went all in the same direction of frighthful possibity, came one by one into her memory. She could not but recollect that her grandfather and Ritchiehad never encouraged her to speak of her father; that when she asked question concerning him they were anything but communicative, gave her vague, briefanswers, and led her mind away to something else. But this reticence she had hitherto set down to the double sorrow which his death had brought, the subject being so fraught with grief and pain that they could not pursue it. What if they had other reasons for their silence! Oh, heaven, the thought was maddening!

The next thing that came before her scarching review was the joyless, melancholy appearance of her grandfather. He had ever presented the aspect of a bowed and stricken man, bearing a heavy weight of sorrow. That, too, had been attributed by her and the neighbors to the bereavement he had sustained. Peggy Yule, the Shepherd's wife, had often told her what a blythe, cheerful man Thomas Moir was, previous to his daughter's death, which he had taken to heart far more than he had done that of his wife, and had never again been able to hold up his head, which was something wonderful, seeing that he was a pious, Christian man, a man of faith in the future and and the invisible, who could well grasp and hold by the injunction to sorrow not as those who had no hope. Yet that was plainly the sorrow wherewith he was afflicted, admitting of no amelioration and no forgetfulness. She could remember, too, how when she was prattling by his knee, he would often look down upon lar with the deepest sadness, while art trickled down his furrowed checks, ad her earliest recollection of his night to prayers inclu power because of the possible answer to them.

The true answer, at all events, she must have, and that at once. Ritchie Dunlop must know the trath or falsehood of Victor Dubosque's assertion. Ha! and had not the Frenchman not referred her to him, and that with confidence, for a corroboration of his statement? Would he have bointed out the readiest means to defeat his wicked purpose? Oh, the accumulated weight of the facts, pressing steadily down in the one frightful direction, was agonising, and cold key fingers seemed to close round her heart, freezing it by their touch. Her earthly weal or woe depended on the words now to be spoken by Ritchie Dunlop. If he confirmed the Frenchman's words of horror, then the darkness of ulter-desolation would descend on the exceeding brightness of her life; her bliss and joy would be quenched, for then no union could take place between her and Hermann.

If her trombling soul, wished to delay

then no union could take place between her and Hermann.

If her trembling soul—wished to delay learning the best of the worst at ones, an inpulse which she had no power to resist caused her to rise from her reat among the rocks, and totter along the rocal to-words the the wills.

must be white and ghast

She must put a strong curb upon her feelings, and meet the crisis with calm, dignified determination. From that moment of inward resolution it was wonderful the change which came over her outward aspect. She might be paler than her wont, but her countenance, though grave, was calm, and her mind was once more under the usual control. There was a dull numbness in the centre of her heart—a cold iey chill, which ought to have been outwardly expressed by a shiver, but every sign of tremor was suppressed, and moved along with quiet and deliberate firmness to the gate of the villa.
