CHAPTER VIII.

AN UNEXPECTED ARRIVAL FROM JAMAICA—THE CONFESSION OF STEPHEN AND MALCOLM.

"And still the marriage never became known?" said Stephen, incredulously.

"Not to those who know the parties. They lived in terror lest Don Jose should discover it and learn where Mrs. Morrar resided, but he never did."

"But did my cousin intend to maintain this secrecy for ever?" queried Stephen.

"A likely thing indeed," supplemented Malcolm.

"No," answered Nathan. "Don Jose was to leave the island in another year, after which Mr. Morrar expected to be able to proclaim his marriage; and perhaps, also, he looked for news of his uncle's death, when he meant to quit Jamaica at once, and carrying his wife to Scotland, where she would be safe from the Spaniard's wrath."

"Well?" said Stephen.

"Go on," cried Malcolm.

"Well," continued Garret, "the news did come to Mr. Morrar of his uncle's death, and a lawyer's letter told him that the estate was his. You wrote the one letter?"

"I did," said Stephen, "and asked if he meant to come to Scotland then, or if he had any instructions to send regarding the property."

"I know," said Nathan, "for I read your letter; and I also saw—I mean Mr. Morrar told me that he had replied, asking you and your brother to remain at Ardgowan till his arrival. It was then he told me he had given you a hint of his marriage."

"Well, and then he—?"

"Then he made arrangements to leave the island, and sailed in the Eglantine."

"Leaving his wife and child in Jamaica?" exclaimed Stephen.

"Oh! as if he would," put in Malcolm, with the air of one who proclaimed the impossibility of such a thing.

Nathan paused for a moment, and his olive complexion grew a shade paler; but in another moment he returned, with great deliberation—

"Yes, leaving his wife and child in Jamaica under my care."

"And why," hastily demanded Stephen, "why did he not bring them with him?"

"Because the child was delicate, and it was feared he could not stand the voyage," was the unhesitating answer.

"Hum," muttered Stephen dubiously.

"Hah," added Malcolm, in the tone of one not ready to believe.

"Do you doubt my word, gentlemen?" asked Garret.

"I am determined to doubt everything," replied Stephen.

"So am I," reiterated his brother.

"Very good," was Nathan's composed rejoinder. "But I have papers here which you cannot doubt. You know your cousin's handwriting—how peculiar it is—how impossible for any one to imitate?"

Garret waited for a reply to this, and Stephen, after a moment's hesitation, nodded his acquiescence.

"Then be good enough to look at this letter," said the overseer, drawing a paper from the packet and unfolding it on the table. "It was given me by Mr. Morrar, who wrote it on the day, almost at the very hour, he sailed. Bend forward and read it."

They did so, and read as follows:—

"My dearest wife,—The Eglantine sails to-night—a day sooner than I expected. I fondly hoped to be with you again before sailing—to see you once more and for the last time in the place where we have enjoyed so much happiness; but this sudden sailing of the vessel prevents me, and we must, my darling, forego this sweet sadness. I give you in charge of Nathan, who will protect you and direct you in everything. This is my special wish. God bless you, my dearest Felicia, and our boy, till we meet. Ever your devoted husband,

"GEORGE MORRAR."

The faces of the two brothers fell considerably as they read this letter. That it was in their cousin's handwriting they could not doubt, being well acquainted with it, and its peculiarity rendering it almost impossible of imitation.

DR. NORMAN MCLEOD.—A pleasing incident is reported in connection with the burial of the much regretted editor of Good Words, which no less reflects honour on his memory, than it indicates the thoughtfulness of Her Majesty.

At the funeral in Campsie churchyard, Dr. Robertson, by command of the Queen and the Royal family, placed on the coffin three immortelles. The first from Her Majesty, bore the inscription, "A token of respect from Prince Leopold," and the third was "A token of respect from Prin-
