recollection of a number of the farmers of this district, one wag among whom has suspended in his dwelling a Globe timeless piece, surmounted by the legend: "No pick here."

It is, however, clear from yesterday's appeal for help against its legitimate business rivals that the Globe's competition with the brass jewelery fakirs of the fall with the brass jewelery fakirs of the fall with the brass jewelery fakirs of the fall who was anticipated. It did not deserve to.

Cainly assuming that every elector who does not read the Globe is steeped in ignorance, Cheap John appeals to his political allies "to discourage the circulation of those papers" which do not take the same view of affairs that it takes, particularly those "pretending to be independent." The pretexts for this beggarly appeal to the prejudices of a faction are, as we have said, that the majority of Canadians are ignoramness, and that the independent press seeks to mislead "by falsehood and misrepresentation." The best evidence bossible that the independent press has not betrayed public confidence by false hood and misrepresentation is found in the popularity of a number of independent newspapers, which, beginning in a small way only a few years ago, have become a power in the politics and the business of the fall way only a few years ago, have become a power in the politics and the business of the fall way only a few years ago, have become a power in the politics and the business of the fall way only a few years ago, have become a power in the politics and the business of the fall way only a few years ago, have become a power in the politics and the business of the fall way only a few years ago, have become a power in the politics and the business of the fall the propers of the fall the prope way only a few years ago, have become a power in the politics and the business of the land. An opposite policy, embracing systematic misrepresentation of men and neasures, and false denials of Canadian progress for party purposes, has depreand its value as a property until we find it where it is, by the wayside, a Brummagem watch in one hand and a party poorbox in the other, bewailing the prosperity of younger enterprises. It is a ctacle that tickles the tories, but that auses pain to those who regretfully remember the time when deference was paid to the journal founded by the Brown family and foundered by their successors. of the Canadian press is not entirely free from a human weakness-that of literary vanity, we might say priggery. When we read in Dr. Johnson's paper, for instance, that we had misspelled a word in one of our articles, and that we "should have consulted the dictionary," we felt that the controversy was closed. We felt at once that any editor who misspelled a word, and who wrote without an open dictionary before him, had no business to differ from the spectator.
