CANADIAN POULTRY IN ENGLAND W. T. Crandall, who has been acting as agent of the department of agriculture in England for several months, has returned to Canada. He superintended the marketing of the trial shipments of fruit, and then waited over to watch the sale of poultry. Despite advice and warnings given to shippers, large consignments of poultry for the English market were sent over in an unsaicable condition. English purchasers call for dressed birds, and although this fact was strongly impressed upon farmers by the department, little attention was paid to it. Those who sent over poultry dressed will derive fair returns as a result of their venture, but there will be practically little or no profit for those who sent over poultry n the feather. As demonstrating the difference in price, it may be stated that Canadian birds unplucked only brought 7d per 4b in retail stores, while Irish birds plucked, but not as good as the Canadian, brought 9d.
