Mackenzie King, Liberal Leader, Heard in Stirring Address by Large Audience (Continued from page 3.) Borden's friends. If Borden did not hold out, the whole structure would fall to pieces; there was no reason for continuing the comedy-drama. (Cries of: Hear, hear.) There was a government without as thead or a policy, said the speaker, and at a time when steady direction and calm judgment was needed more than it had been at any time. Sir George E. Poster, Mr. King understood, was to be the acting prime minister, and as his advanced years would not allow him to officiate at night sessions of the house, the conditions that would obtain if the question of the St. John harbor were to come up! The deputy prime minister, would refer the matter to the acting prime minister and he in turn would eave it until whatever time Sir Robert would refer the matter to the acting prime minister and he in turn would even the conditions that would obtain if the question of the St. John harbor were to come up! The deputy prime minister, would refer the matter to the acting prime minister and he in turn would even it was that way last session—they passed the buck, to use a slang term. (Laughter). The Grand Trunk. Before the Grand Trunk railway The Grand Trunk railway The deard in Stirring Stirring Maritime Provinces there was not a single man holding a portfolio. To have were no representatives of the three provinces was the legical policy of a Union government without as the policy now if men were not holding public office merely for the portion of the strain and the sack of power. (Applause.) The present government knew that it would be lost to officiate at night sessions of the house, the conditions that would obtain if the question of the St. John harbor were to be appointed a deputy acting prime minister, and as his advanced years would never the matter to the acting prime minister and he in turn would refer the matter to the acting prime minister and he in turn would refer the matter to the acting prime minister and he

The Grand Trunk.

Before the Grand Trunk railway measure came up, it was announced by Sir George Foster that the house would prorogue on a certain date. On that date many returned to their homes; many took the opportunity of crossing to Great Britain; and while they were away, with a small attendance, a select cabinet group introduced the measure which meant an expenditure of $500,000,000 to $700,000,000, and they put it through on the ground that it was urgent and of vital public importance. The method was bad—(cries of "Hear, hear")—and gave no possible chance for fair criticism.

fair criticism.

As the railway people reserved the right of placing their part of the bargain before their shareholders in Great Britain, many persons were of the opinion that the same right should be given the Canadian people, whose money was being expended, and the speaker himself asked that the agreement be ratified before parliament, but was told that the government would not consider anything of the kind, though the arrangement made with the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk Pacific was offered as contributory evidence.

Was that responsible government? asked the speaker.

Nevertheless, he continued, the agreement had not been signed yet. It was some years since he had not been signed yet. It was some years since he had had something to say about St.

Not Responsible.

Then, the federal government, as it stood now, was not a responsible and representative government, as the average man understood it. There were no representatives of this province in the government at the present time. He had been in Charlottetown recently and it the legislative chambers there had seen the original engraving of the fathers of confederation, among whom three names stood out prominently—Sir Leonard Tilley, of this province (applause); Sir Charles Tupper and Sir George E. Cartier—all opposed to the Liberal government but held in veneration for the valuable work that they had done. Since that time there had been other representatives of the maritime provinces in the government of Canada—Sir Louis Davis, of Prince Edward Island, Sir Robert Borden and Hon. W. S. Fielding, of Nova Scotia, and the Hon. Andrew G. Blair, of New Brunswick (Applause).

These were great names in the history of the country; men who had moulded the thought of the younger men throughout the country and models for the guidance of other men of public affairs. The representatives of the Maritime Provinces had done much to help form his opinions and judgments in his early political career—how could the men of Ontario or other parts of the Dominion be helped by the political genius of the

Referring to a delegation from the St. John Commercial Club, which waited upon him yesterday morning with regard to the congestion of the harbor and the freight yards here, with American railways carrying Canadian freight and boosting the level of exchange, the speaker said that it semed peculiar to him at first that such a delegation should come to the leader of the opposition to get consideration.

Here he was interrupted with a bedlam of cheering and applause with frequent cries of "That's the stuff."

But on the other hand, who was

But on the other hand, who was there else to go to? (Laughter and applause.) They did not know where the Prime Minister was; in fact, the prime minister himself did not know where he was nor wither he was going. There was no cabinet minister to represent them, and so it was evident that they had decided to back a sure thing and put their faith in a man whom they thought would be the people's choice as a representative. (Applause.)

Personally, he pledged himself to do everything in his power in this matter which was so greatly affecting the port and terminus business.

Pacific and the Grand Trunk Pacific was offered as contributory evidence.

Was that responsible government? asked the speaker.

Nevertheless, he continued, the agreement had not been signed yet. It was some years since he had sat in the Laurier cabinet with a minister who represented a New Brunswick constituency, and every day that gentleman though the government has signified the intention of making any changes which the shareholders might deem necessary, he was of the opinion that the people and the press of Canada should demand that the agreement should hold over until the house meets again.

The expenditure of this measure would last for years and embraced taxation on future generations.

Not Responsible.

Then, the federal government, as it stood now, was not a responsible and something to say about St. John. (Laughter and applause.) He was a man persuasive beyond words, untiring, aggressive. For some time it had been finished, for the ministers to repair to Sir Wilfrid's room and there the usual question of the leader was, "Is there anything else to discuss?" Quite frequently the other members were at a loss for a subject, but Dr. Pugsley would always ask for a few moments to discuss matters in regard to Courtenay Bay. (Applause and stored the farm of the leader was, "Is there anything else to discuss?" The cost of clothing, food and footwear; if the tariff caused these high prices, then the tariff should be modified. (Applause).

Luxuries, he said, should bear a larger to could carry on his labor at the least must be made so that the worker could carry on his labor at the least must be made so that the worker must be made so that the worker cost of the sea, of the min. It im the Laurier cabinet with a minister who represented a New Brunswick constituency, and every day that gentleman cost production of all import duties on instruments of production in industries based upon the natural resources.

Products of the sea, of the min. Carry on his labor at the least cost for the least cost for the least cost f tion to help do all that was possible for the country, but not everyone was aware that every cent of that loan went to pay for current expenditure by the government and that every cent represented by the loan had been borrowed from the banks by the government before the people had subscribed one cent. There would be another loan, he said, for the government needed another $500,000,000 to tide it over its liabilities. Considering the finances of the country, he thought there should be some accounting of the nation's liabilities, so that there could be more economy. War conditions meant spending money in large amounts rapidly, and so long as the people who had been in that custom were kept in office there would be no relief from debt.

The money which must be raised to relief from debt.

The money which must be raised to meet the country's liabilities must come from taxation, and the Liberal party was convinced that there are many wealthy men in the country who are patriotic enough to shoulder the burden from those who have paid such a sacrifice in the war and make good the payment of a revenue once the debt has gone beyond a certain figure. There would beyond a certain figure. There would be a great battle over this, he thought, but the party would stand by that de-cision to a finish. (Applause.) Taxation of Wealth.

In the last analysis all taxation must come from wealth, and greater wealth would come from a greater development of natural resources. Products of the sea, of the mine of the land, must be increased, and it must be made so that the worker could carry on his labor at the least cost possible. To this end he would favor the abolition of all import duties on instruments of production in industries based upon the natural resources of the country, such as

The Labor Plank.

Another plank in the party platform was in regard to labor. He did not believe in a class government. Any succussful enterprise was made successful only through the co-operation of four factors: capital, management, service of the state and labor. With regard to labor, he would seek to raise the status of industry so that its voice would be more effective and better heard than ever before. There were industrial boards and railways boards, but few working men acting on those boards. Among the work men on the railway systems, he said, there were men just as competent to sit on a board of directors as could be found in any other group. If the Liberal party were returned to power he would give were returned to power he would give the working men the aboards which control their activities a boards which control their activities a couple of representatives, and he thought

Perhaps some might think he was a little strong in his remarks about the government were supporting the proventment were supporting the advance pers supporting the government were floated in extract from the Montreal Gazette, which brought forth much applause. He would judge from the original sessendants of the government that treachery and cowardice were the cardinal virtues of the Union government. (Laughter.)

The Leader's Qualifications.

The Leader's Qualifications.

The various elements that were scattered and divided needed a new leader to give them the impetus back to unity and that leader was Mr. Mackenzie King. He likened Mr. King to his grandfather who fought years ago for liberty, and so Mr. King was fighting today against autocratic domination over the people. He had made a life study of all economic problems and was bringing to the leadership of the Canadian people the brains and intellect of a great scholar as well as the force and energy of a man of action. "Laurier was the greatest Canadian that ever lived," said Mr. Lapointe and he had heard him once say that those who assailed him would render him justice after his death, and they had done so. His memory would remain so long as Canada had a heart. Mr. King was a pupil of Sir Wilfrid's and he would maintain the traditions of his country. Mr. King was a Liberal, so was he, because it was broad enough to invite all Canadians to fight shoulder to shoulder for liberty, explained the speaker. Liberalism embraced all creeds, French and English, capital and labor, giving to each individual the chance he claimed for himself.

He thought that no man supported the government more lavishly than the inde-claimed for himself.

He thought that no man supported the government more lavishly than the independents of 1917. On several questions of moment before the house they had swallowed their opinions at the command of the premier and goose-stepped to the crack of his whip. He insisted that the government should represent the majority of the people of Canada and the government did not do this, but the ministers were afraid to show their faces to the people and allowed their byelections to go by default.

that the result would be a better administration and a surer safeguarding of the public. The Liberal party did not stand for monopoly, but for joint control.

With respect to the war veterans, the Liberal party was not in favor of granting a couple of thousands to the men, indiscriminately; the plan was not favorable to the men, either. The veterans, as a class, did not like interference from people who did not understand their needs, and in this regard the party platform was drafted by a committee headed by Colonel Ralston, of Halifax.
