and she would have allowed her husband to keep a messenger in the back garden, let alone adopting a stable boy, rather than permit the question of return to be discussed. About 4 of the afternoon the mountebank rendered up his ghost; he had never been conscious since his capture. Dr. Despres was present at his last passage, and declared the face over. Then he took Jean-Marie by the shoulder, and led him out into the sun garden, where there was a convenient bench beside the river. Here he sat him down and made the boy place himself on his left.

"Jean-Marie," he said very gravely, "this world is exceedingly vast, and even France, which is only a small corner of it, is a great place for a little lad like you. Unfortunately it is full of eager, shouldering people moving on, and there are very few beautiful things for so many others. Your master is dead; you are not fit to gain a living by yourself; you do not wish to steal! No, your situation, then, is undesirable; it is, for the moment, critical. On the other hand, you behold in me a man not old, though elderly, still enjoying the youth of the heart and the intelligence; a man of instruction; easily situated in this world's affairs; having a good table; a man, neither as friend nor host, to be despised. I offer you your food and clothes, and to teach you lessons in the evening, which will be gradually more to the purpose for a lad of your stamp than those of the great-grandfather in Europe. I propose no wages, but if ever you take a thought to leave me the doctor shall be open, and I will give you 100 francs to start the world upon. In return, I have an old horse and chaise, which you would very speedily learn to drive, clean and keep in order. Do not hurry yourself to answer, and take it or leave it as you judge right. Only remember this, that I am no sentimentalist or charitable person, but a man who lives rigorously to himself; and that if I make the proposal it is for my own sake—it is because I perceive a clear advantage to myself. And now reflect."

"I shall be very glad. I do not see what else I can do. I thank you, sir, most kindly, and I will try to be useful," said the boy.

"Thank you," said the doctor, warmly, rising at the same time and wiping his brow, for he had suffered agonies while the thing hung in the wind. A refusal, after the scene at night, would have placed him in a ridiculous light before Anastase. "How kind and heavy is the evening, to be sure! I have always had a fancy to be a fish in summer, Jean-Marie, here in the L'Ange Grotto. I should be under a water lily and listen to the bells, which must sound most deliciously down below. That would be a life—do you not think so, boy?"

"Yes," said Jean-Marie.

"Think God, you have imagination!" cried the doctor, embracing the boy with his usual effusive warmth, though it was a proceeding that seemed to discomfort the sufferer almost as much as if he had been an English school boy of the same age. "And now," he added, "I will take you to my wife."

Mrs. Despres sat in the dining room in a cool wrapper. All the blinds were down, and the floorboards beneath her feet were damp with water; her eyes were half shut, but she affected to be reading a novel as they entered. Though she was a bustling woman, she enjoyed repose between meals and had a remarkable appetite for sleep.

The doctor went through a solemn form of introduction, adding, for the benefit of both parties, "You must try to like each other for my sake."

"He is very pretty," said Anastase. "Will you kiss me, my pretty little fellow?"

"Will you kiss me, my pretty little fellow?" the doctor was furious, and dragged her into the passage.

"What is the matter, Jean-Marie?" he asked. "What is all this fuss about the fact of women? Heavens know, I have not met with it in my experience. You address my little philosopher as if he were an infant. He must be spoken to with more respect, I tell you; he must not be kissed and Georgey-porgy'd like an ordinary child."

"I only did it to please you, I am sure," replied Anastase, "but I will try to do better."

The doctor apologized for his warmth. "But I do wish him," he continued, "to feel at home among us. And really your conduct was so idiotic, my cherished one, and so utterly and distinctly out of place, that a saint might have been pardoned a little vehemence in disapproval. Do, do try—if it is possible for a woman to understand young people—but of course it is not, and I waste my breath. Hold your tongue as much as possible at least, and observe my conduct narrowly; it will serve you for a model."

Anastase did as she was bidden, and considered the doctor's behavior. She observed that he had kissed the boy three times in the course of the evening, and managed generally to confound and abash the little fellow out of speech and appetite. But she had the true womanly heroism in little affairs, and only did she refrain from the cheap revenge of exposing the doctor's error to himself, but she did her best to remove their ill effect on Jean-Marie. When Despres went out for his last breath of air before retiring for the night, she came over to the boy's side and took his hand.

"You must try to be surprised not frightened by my husband's manners," she said. "He is the kindest of men, but so clever that he is sometimes difficult to understand. You will soon grow used to him, and then you will love him, for that nobody can help. As for me, you may be sure, I shall try to make you happy, and will not bother you at all. I think we should be excellent friends, you and I. I am not clever, but I am very good natured. Will you give me a kiss?"

He held up his face, and she took him in her arms and then began to cry. The woman had spoken in complaisance; but she had warmed to her own words, and tenderness followed. The doctor, entering, found them enfolded; he concluded that his wife was in fault; and he was just beginning in an awful voice, "Anastase," when she looked to at him, smiling, with an upraised finger; and he held his speech, wondering, while she led the boy to his attic.

CHAPTER IV.

THE EDUCATION OF A PHILOSOPHER.

The installation of the adopted stable boy was thus happily effected, and the wheels of life continued to run smoothly in the doctor's house. Jean-Marie did his house and carriage duty in the morning; sometimes helped in the housework; sometimes walked abroad with the doctor, to drink wisdom from the fountain head; and was introduced at night to the sciences and the dead languages. He retained his singular placidity of mind and manner; he was rarely in fault; but he made only a very partial progress in his studies, and remained much of a stranger in the family.

The doctor was a pattern of regularity. All forenoon he worked on his great book, the "Comparative Pharmacopoeia, or Historical Dictionary of all Medicines," which as yet consisted principally of slips of paper and pins. When finished, it was to fill many portable volumes and to combine many of the interests of professional utility.

But the doctor was studious of literary grace and the picturesque; an associate, a touch of manner, a moral qualification, or a sounding epithet was sure to be preferred before a piece of science; a little more, and he would have written the "Comparative Pharmacopoeia" in verse! The article "Mamma," for instance, was already complete, though the remainder of the work had not progressed beyond the letter A. It was exceedingly copious and entertaining, written with quaintness and color, exact, erudite, a literary article; but it was really a mere display of the doctor's learning, and a forced guidance to a practicing physician of today. The feminine good sense of his wife had led her to point out with unusual promising severity; for the dictionary was read aloud to her, betwixt sleep and dawn, as it proceeded towards its perfect distant completion; and the doctor was a little sore on the subject of mamma, and sometimes resented an allusion to it.

After the midday meal and a proper period of digestion he walked, sometimes alone, sometimes accompanied by Jean-Marie, for Madame would have preferred any hardship rather than walk.

She was, as I have said, a very busy person, continually occupied about material comforts and ready to drop asleep over a novel the instant she was disengaged. This was the less objectionable, as she never smoked or grew discontented in completion. On the contrary, she looked the very picture of luxurious and appetizing ease and repose without the least consciousness of her faculties. I am afraid she was greatly an animal, but she was a very nice animal to have about. In this way she had little to do with Jean-Marie; but the sympathy which had been established between them on the first night rendered her, through the doctor's influence, a more perfect possession of her faculties. I fear, however, that in her heart of hearts, Madame kindly despised and pitied the boy. She had no admiration for his class of virtues; she liked a smart, polite, forward, roughish sort of boy, cap in hand, light of foot, meeting the eye the liked volubility, charm, a little vice—the promise of a second novel the instant she was disengaged. They held occasional conversations, mostly on household matters. To the extreme disappointment of the doctor, they occasionally sallied off together to that temple of debasing superstition, the village church. Madame and he, both in their Sunday's best, drove twice a month to Fontainebleau and returned laden with purses and snuff. Although the doctor still continued to regard them as irreconcilably antipathetic, their relation was so intimately friendly and confidential as their nature suffered.

A Sure Relief.

I suffered from a hard Cough contracted by damp feet. Having consulted a local doctor without effect I thought I would try Hagar's Pectoral Balm as a last resort. Before I had finished the first bottle my cough had entirely disappeared, and today I enjoy better health than ever before. I can conscientiously recommend it. Chas. H. A Successful Result.

Sirs, I was troubled for five years with Liver Complaint, I used a great deal of doctors' medicine, which did me no good. I was getting worse all the while until I tried Burdock Blood Bitters. After taking four bottles I am now well. I can also recommend it for dyspepsia. Miss Estelle L. Swift, St. Williams P. O., Ont.
