Watson Sceesky, aged 53, of New York, was accused of vagrancy, and explained that he had run away after being spanked by his father, aged 76, because he annoyed his grandfather, aged 101.

After hearing both sides of a story you are in a position to press it up.

A WOMAN'S HONOR

"Your friendship for a man like Waldorfe proves that you can't. Your blindness to the dangers that you are running shows that you want looking after. As to what your life has to do with me, I think you know; but as you pretend you don't, I'll try and make you see."

"Do you mind if I smoke a cigarette while you are doing it?" asked Etherea viciously.

"It's your house—your own little doll's house! I have no right to dictate what games you shall play in it. Etherea closed her gold cigarette case with a venomous click.

"You might have the politeness to offer me a match."

"I used to feel this way when I was a small boy," said Kenniston good-naturedly, as he held out a lighted match. "It is burning all down one side," he added, as he watched the paper blacken.

Etherea threw her cigarette away and lit another.

"Now go ahead and tell me the story of your life, or whatever it is you wish to unburden yourself of; you won't disturb me in the least."

She curled up her feet on the Directoire sofa and assumed an aggressively comfortable attitude.

Kenniston sat where the girl's eyes could not entirely evade his own; he felt that he could afford to throw away no advantage in this contest of wills. He had not meant to tell the girl what he was going to tell her; he knew that the time was not ripe, and yet it seemed the best hope of gaining an influence over her.

"You asked me what your life has to do with me, and I am going to try and make you understand," Etherea puffed defiantly. "All my life until last year I have worked"—he spoke in a low voice which was not too steady—"many jobs in many places; a good many of the jobs were not the ones a man would choose if he had a choice. Do you know why I worked?"

Etherea blew an insolent ring.

"You can't pretend it was for me."

"It came to be with you. At first it was some woman whom I could not see, but I knew that she was somewhere in the world; then as I grew older she became more distinct yet still a shadow. In the lonely places where I have lived there are no women, only the shadows of women. We call them from somewhere, and they cluster about the smoke of the camp-fire in summer; they come down the shanty chimney with the back draught in winter—to each man the shadow of the woman he is working for. They are women we can talk about because we have never met them. The man who is working for some real woman he has left behind him, he has a shadow; what was it about her; maybe he'll show a picture, graph or something which she has made, but he doesn't discuss her the way a man can discuss the woman who is only a shadow. What was it my cousin made out I'd said? Oh, yes, I remember—that the sculls of good women are made by strong men in silent places. It's true, though, and the strange thing is this—the worse the men the better the women they create. The higher the ideal they imagine."

Etherea did not even look up to see if he was talking for effect; she knew by the slight tremor of his voice that he was talking from out the depths. What he said had touched her, and that made her furious. She gave a sarcastic laugh.

"I'm no class morally; I must have been made by one of the very good men."

"I don't think so," he replied dreamily. He was wondering what she would have thought if she had seen him killing Hans Bass.

"As a matter of fact, very good men bring out my very worst qualities. You have no idea what an effect they have on me. You, for instance—"

"You ought to have kept that for one of your novels."

Etherea colored, for it was a line from "The Villain"—a novel which she was writing at a moment.

"We are wandering away from what I am trying to make you understand," he suggested gently. "I told you that each man worked for some woman, real or imaginary. The woman I worked for was very like you. After I had read 'The Hoarded Memory' I knew that the shadow which I had called up 'really' had a body—that somewhere in the world I might find her. It was after that I made my strike. I took some—desperate chances for the sake of a woman I had never seen, but I won. I think the greatest pleasure I had in all these years was picturing the house in England I was some day to buy. Sometimes I got a copy of Country Life. There is no reading in the world to compare with the advertisements of English country houses for sale in Country Life—I mean when you are living in the wilderness."

"Those country house advertisements always suggest rats and mice and damp passages to me," said Etherea, sniffing. She was finding it more and more necessary to harden her heart.

"To me they meant that was worth while going on with the struggle; a reason for getting to my feet again when I had been knocked down; they meant the goal-posts to which I was fighting through the scurrilous."

There was one in Norfolk I wanted more than any other—twelve bedrooms, billiard-room, smoking-room, gun-room, oak-paneled entrance hall, three thousand acres of shooting, small well-wooded park."

"Didn't it have a drawing-room?" asked Etherea, forgetting that she was taking no interest in this man's dreams.

"I suppose it did," he answered vaguely, "but it was before I had read 'The Hoarded Memory'—when the woman of my dreams was still a shadow."

"Underneath the billiard-table, inside the gun-cupboard—any place good enough for her, I suppose, so like a man!"

"After I had read 'The Hoarded Memory' I paid more attention to the drawing-rooms and the gardens in the advertisements. The shadow was getting more real then; but the place in Norfolk had been bought by somebody else long before that. I nearly had it, though. I was gold-mining at the time; I was within a hundred feet of a great fortune. The man who struck the vein died six months afterwards. At first he was not so good as he was. I might as well have had it and the place in Norfolk; losing that place was one of the bitter moments of my life."

"Perhaps the drains were bad, and somebody died of typhoid," suggested Etherea hopefully, again forgetting that she was taking no interest.

"Not he! He was a good man. I went down to Norfolk to see the place when I came back to England; prowled round outside. There was a duck decoy, but he's let it go to pot, and turned down golden pheasants. I hear the county haven't taken to him; there was some talk about his selling."

"Perhaps you'll get it yet; you always get what you want, don't you?"

"Etherea!" Kenniston suddenly leant forward and took her hand. "Don't you see it is you I want? I have always been a young man, but I want much more than an—all lovers are poets for a moment;—than a moon-beam once, but I want that moon-beam. The place in Norfolk was only a house for you to light—only a frame for the picture. All the country houses I ever looked for were only houses for you. I never went out in my imagination to mark timber or see how the turpils were growing and the young pheasants coming on but you were with me. I had your hand in mine, as I have it now. I met your soul when I met your first book; then I met you, and all I have ever worked for and planned for is coming true, isn't it?"

Montreal, Oct. 16.—A despatch received from Ottawa contains official announcement that the shipping interests, using the port of St. John, have just applied to the Minister of Commerce and Labor for a board of arbitration under the Industrial Disputes Act of 1907, with reference to a dispute between them and the longshoremen of that port. The application is being considered.

It is understood here that if the demands of the men are conceded, the rates for stevedore service at St. John would be the highest on the continent.

Lace caps for evening wear are a new and pretty conceit of fashion. They will be hailed with delight by the woman who likes to frame her face in a soft frill of lace, and the devotees of the bowler hat will also take to the new fashion. Three of the prettiest new caps designed for evening wear are shown above.

The cap shown at the top of the picture is particularly attractive, fine shadow lace being used for its development. A deep frill of the lace edges the cap. A huge bow of soft satin is the distinctive feature of the second.

SLEEP DISTURBING BLADDER WEAKNESS BACKACHE-RHEUMATISM, QUICKLY VANISH

Even Most Chronic Sufferers Find Relief From Few Doses of Croxone.

Croxone soon relieves such conditions because it reaches the very roots of the disease. It soaks right into the stopped up, inactive kidneys, through the walls and linings; cleans out the little filtering cells and glands; neutralizes and dissolves the poisonous uric acid substances that lodge in the joints and muscles; to scratch and irritate and cause rheumatism; heals the inflamed membranes of the bladder, and cleans out and strengthens the stopped up, lifeless kidneys so they can filter and sift all the poisons from the blood, and drive it out of the system.

So sure, so positive, so quick and lasting, are the results obtained from the use of Croxone, that three doses a day for a few days are often all that is required to end the worst backache, regulate the most annoying bladder disorders, and overcome the numerous other similar conditions.

Croxone is so prepared that it is practically impossible to take it without results.

An original package costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if Croxone fails to give desired results, regardless of how old you are, how long you have suffered, or what else has failed.

ST. JOHN, Oct. 17.—Premier Fleming in conjunction with Dr. Anglin, examined the tenders for the supplies to the Provincial Hospital yesterday afternoon, and decided to award contracts as follows: O'Neill Bros., meat; Slav's Bakery, bread; M. R. A., dry goods; Clifton Brown and C. A. Rickard, hardware; John Newcastle Company, paint and oils; G. E. Harb, flour, lard, groceries; Waterbury & Rising, boots and shoes; Starr Co., hard coal.

Mr. Fleming and Mr. Wilson inspected the new laundry which is being built to replace the one destroyed by fire. The new structure, which is nearing completion, will be fireproof, and an improvement over the old in many ways. A good deal of the work on the building has been done by patients at the hospital.

They also inspected the work being done on the foundations of the new bridge over the Reversing Falls. They were given a very satisfactory report with the character of the work, but thought it was not proceeding as fast as they expected it would do.

Next week Hon. Mr. Fleming is going to Ottawa on provincial business, and will attend the Inter-provincial Conference on the 22nd. He has been given notice that the subject of Maritime representation will again be introduced. The government will probably meet in St. John the first Tuesday in November. Asked about the progress of work on the Valley Railway, Mr. Fleming stated that matters were progressing satisfactorily.

"Will the Andover-Grand Falls section of the line be built?" he was asked.

"Well, it looks that way, despite the predictions of some of the newspapers to the contrary," was the reply.

SEEK TO INJURE CANADIAN PORTS

International Union, whose headquarters are in the United States, they have no doubt with a view to handicapping Canadian ports. In this connection some interesting disclosures are likely to be made.

Shippers declare that they would have no objection to recognizing a local union, but they see no reason why an American union should interfere and attempt to dictate.

In view of these facts it is felt that some effort on the part of St. John to offer reasonable inducements to shipowners to use that port should be made.
