His second word was downed by a yell, and by a crash of stones upon the house of the bootmaker who was so unfortunate as to have the Leforts for lodgers. The situation was so dangerous that the mayor retired from his exposed position, and small blame to him.

blame to him.

But Monsieur Lefort came forward to his own window. Mrs. Price had been far more formidable to this French gentleman than all the canaille of the town could possibly be. He turned very pale, indeed; but it was because of the insulting shouts that reached Marie's ears as well as his own. Having sent his daughter, who, brave as she was, was certainly not too brave to tremble, with the two children into a back room, he went straight to the window and displayed to the crowd the barrel of some ancient weapon of the blunderbuss order. As an answer to this piece of bravado went up a roar, half of anger, half of laughter; and then a stone went up also, sufficiently well aimed to hit the old Frenchman on the shoulder.

The sting of the stone roused up the spirit of combat in him who felt it. Hitherto he had been a gentleman defying canaille, and a father defending his children; but now he was a Frenchman who had received, who we had received. children; but now he was a Frenchman who had received a blow. He retired at once from the window, but it was

"Let's rout out the lot of 'em!" cried The mob answered with a confused burlesque of the shouts of the hunting field, and a charge was made at the street door of the house, which, barred and bolted as it was, could not resist the rush for long. In a minute or two it gave way, and the two or three men who were immediately pressing against it were sent flying into the entrance passes of the country of the strength of the country o sage, and in a second trampled under the feet of their followers. The shop was soon in the wildest disorder, and a few of the invaders, eager for mischief, were beginning to mount the stairs. Marie was on her knees, praying to saints and angels with all her strength; the boot-maker and his wife had followed the example of Lorry. Suddenly the sound of a shot was only to fill his weapon with powder and

heard, and then a cry from the street.

Marie sprang from her knees in wild alarm; and the mob was hushed for an instant into silence. But only for an instance, for in another there went up to the skies such a roar as Denethorp had never heard. Stones flew like hail and at random many recolling upon the heads of those who threw them. Meanwhile not a few of the rioters disconwith this barren mode of attack, into the house itself, and were, little by little, and step by step, forcing those who had already entered it up the It seemed only a question of whether the second story itself should be reached, whether Marie's own room should be invaded by this horrible tide.

It was a terrible moment. But, thank heaven, "when bale is hext, boot is next"—so it is always. The longing ears of the mayor were at last gladdened by und of the galloping of hoofs upof steel. In another instant the end of street that opened upon the market place was filled with a welcome vision of shining helmets and scarlet coats and

The sharp word of command rang through the street, and the coward heart of the Hydra shrank and shriveled. Cap-tain Seward, who was in command of the troop, leaving his men where they were, rode forward alone through the crowd. as coolly and carelessly as if it had con-sisted of so much brushwood, towards the house where the mayor was beckoning to him from the window; and not a man opposed his passage. It is nonsense to say that an English mob has any peculiar respect for the law; but it has a peculiar fear of the law when reminded of its strength by the sight of a sword or a truncheon, and this goes far to sup-ply the want of respect. Before the offi-cer had reached the door the street was

All was well, then, after all, except for the breaking of glass—and, as his son-in-law was a glazier-well, it's an ill wind that blows nobody good! So thought the mayor, as he shook hands with Captain Seward. But so did not think Marie. Poor Monsieur Leford, too proud to leave the window, had been struck on the temple during that last wild storm of stones; and, when she emerged from her own room, she found him dead.,

CHAPTER VII.

Hugh's wound had left him in a very feeble state of convalescence, so that he was now just in that condition which a woman, however much of manliness she may have in her character, is likely to may have in her character, is likely to fix upon as giving her a good opportunity for bringing a man to task, and in which a man is no match for the weakest of women. For it is impossible to rebel against an affectionate nurse, even were it not a trouble; and when a Mader Clear is the nurse and a Hugh Madame Clare is the nurse, and a Hugh Lester the patient, the impossibility is more impossible still.

"But you had considered the matter, did you not say?"

She took his hand in hers, with a greater show of affection than he had ever witnessed before. Tenderness is a better weapon of attack than pride, and he was moved. "My dear aunt-my dearest mother-I do know. I do remember. But I know also that I am doing what is right, and that you will acknowledge that I am do-ing what is right in the end. You cannot ask me to give up, to break my word to her I love when she is most helpless. In this I cannot obey you, nor could you wish me to. In everything

"Yes," she said, excitedly, "in every-thing but in what concerns the most imthing but in what concerns the most important step in your whole life—in everything but just where I require your obedience most! That is not trust—that is not obedience. Hugh, if you persist in this folly of yours, we cannot be as we have always been; and I shall not we have always been; and I shall hot care about anything any more. If you have a right to choose who shall be your wife, I have a right to choose who shall be my daughter. Decide between her and me. I will speak no more about it now, and I pray that you may see things in a better light." And so the conversation ended for the present, leaving Miss Clare angry and her nephew exhausted. Neither recurred to the subject for some days; on the contrary, both studiously avoided it. But the truce was hollow, and both alike felt that the great struggle was to come. Miss Clare was perfectly sincere in saying that she would be infinitely distressed by a breach between herself and her nephew; she would have been right had she said that it would have rendered her THE WORLD OF SPORTS.

"Hugh," she accordingly said to him a day or two before he was to leave for London, "I suppose you will be seeing Alice Raymond again before very long?" "Oh, I shall call there at once, of course. Have you any message for her?" "I will give you a letter for her. What a dear girl she is! I got quite to look upon her as my other child."

TREE-PLANTING ON PRAIRIES. In the opinion of Mr. William L. Hall, of the division of forestry, the time has come for an extensive development of forest plantations in the Middle West. The demand for timber has also increased, owing to the rapid diminution of the supply of natural timber in the Mississippi valley. Mr. Hall believes that 500,000 acres of timber, annually planted, would be inadequate to meet the de-

A Lesson Regarding and Signing of Bills.

Bill to Incorporate Huron, Bruce and Middlesex Railway Company Referred Back to Committee.

[Special to The Advertiser.]

Toronto, Feb. 24.-Hon. J. M. Gibson, read the members of the legislature a lecture this afternoon on the practice of lending their names to bills in which they apparently take no further interest. The matter was brought up through a motion, by Mr. Taylor, of North Middlesex, to recommit to the committee on railways the bill to incorporate the Huron, Bruce and Middlesex Railway Company, which was introduced by Mr. Conmee. Mr. Conmee was not in and Mr. Gibson, while admitting that there was reason that the bill should be sent back, said that members took the responsibility of signing their names to bills far too lightly. They appeared to think that, having given witnessed by over 500 people, was one or the fastest that has been played here this winter. The Delawares certainly have an enviable record for this season't work, having won in every game played with London teams. The following is a list of games and the scores:

brought up. The attorney-general added that he understood all the members for Mid-dlesex, and the member for London as well, were opposed to the bill, which gave very wide power.

Mr. Whitney sympathized with the attorney-general, but did not see any hope for a change, while the house was as courteous as it was. Mr. Hill (West York) moved that the bill respecting Toronto Junction be referred back to the private bills committee on the ground that he had received several letters in opposition to it, and the people of the junction were opposed to several of the clauses. One of the letters, he said, was from an ex-mayor

Hon. Mr. Harcourt wished to know what clauses were objected to, and Mr. Hill replied that his correspondents took exception to that respecting the new stock yards. He further said that when the bill was discussed at committee only about one-third of the members had been present.

Mr. Whitney did not see that they need discuss the matter longer. Mr. Hill had given no reason why the bill should be referred, and the house would not insult its dignity in sending it back. Hon, Mr. Harcourt said that bills should be referred only when the com-mittee had been received or when all the evidence in the matter had not been received. If they permitted reference in other cases the house would sit six
