"Well I have done"-there is a terrible weariness in his voice now-"it is all over I shall never speak to you on the sub-ject again; that," unsteadily, "you have grossly wronged me in your thoughts, time will teach you.'

He pauses and looks at her as if waiting; surely she will at least say ness of the past, here, in this last hour.
"Can I go now?" she asks in a tone of polite inquiry, largely mingled with relief, once more moving across the shiny sands towards the steps that will take her away forever. Description upon him, and a madness unconquerable. She is going, she will soon be gone, and there will be afterwards only the long, awful blank, the horror of living, the day after day intolerable existence, with nothing in the present and no hope for the morrow. Great heaven, how cruel a woman can be, and such a woman. In this one single last moment it seems to him that all her sweetness, all her tenderest charms her exquisite beauty, are shown to him in colors more radiant than even with all his fatal passion for her he has ever yet beheld them. The soft white gown that holds her, the lissome figure, the slender, perfect fingers, the little queenly head, so delicately poised upon the shapely neck, and the eyes those eyes, like stars of heaven, that have never yet sought his save in contempt and anger. All are going! Already her foot is on the stairs.

She turns as if startled by that im-passioned cry, and then, he hardly knows how it is, he hardly dares to remember afterwards, but somehow she is in his arms, and he is looking down into her frightened eyes with a terrible entreaty in his own. Will she relent? "Do you know what you are doing?

he says, his miserable voice scarcely above a whisper. "My darling, my soul have pity!" More closely his arms bind her. He bends his face to hers-nearer, nearer still; and then, suddenly, a great loathing of himself fills him. He draws back with a sharp shudder, and almost pushes her from him. "Go!" he says vehemently; and in another moment she has turned the corner of the winding stairs, and is gone.

With a heavy groan he flings himself face downwards on the cool, sweet, shifting sands, that moon-smitten lie trembling, waiting for the dawn.
