A NEW FRUIT INDUSTRY. The Domesticated Blueberry.

(The Rural New Yorker.) It is probable that all or most of our popular fruits were originally wild. They have been domesticated, improved and made subject to man, as the dog, the cat and the horse or cow have been. Some of them, like the Baldwin apple, were evidently superior seedlings growing at random in the woods and likely to 'blush unseen" until the end of their life unless by accident man chances to discover them and noting their excellence, take measures to improve and preserve them.

We are now witnessing the domestication of a new wild truit-the blue berry. This fruit has ranked among the best that nature has to offer, but
