

DRESSING THE DOG.

One rainy day last summer these three children, Maud, Ethel and Johnnie Pemberton went to the nursery to play. They played all the games they could think of and at last decided to try to dress up Carlo, the dog.

Now Carlo was usually a good-tempered dog, but to-day he wasn't feeling well. Maybe he had had too much dinner. Any way he felt cross. After much coaxing Johnnie got Carlo into the nursery and shut the door. Then Maud ran for her old sunbonnet which she had outgrown. And Ethel went to grandma's room to get grandma's shawl and cape. When they got back to the nursery they found Carlo under the lounge, and Johnnie trying in vain to induce him to come out. But at last they got him out, and by feeding him to keep him still, tied the sunbonnet on him. Then they let him do his best to get rid of the funny thing on his head. Finding at last that he could not get it off he stopped trying, and then Maud threw the cape over him and tied it on. Ethel put the shawl around his neck and pinned it on. And then! "O, don't he look funny! Look out! Ethel, you'll knock that plant over!" and such shouts of delight and warning that nurse came up to see what was the matter. She called to them; Master Johnnie, Miss Ethel and Miss Maud, come and let me get you ready for supper." The children looked at each other, surprised to know it was five o'clock.
