

no usotry to teach such people the causes which make wages so much higher in the United States than in Canada. They only see the difference, and accord it to the different political institutions. It is useless to tell them that the great wages now paid to workmen in the States are paid at the expense of the farming population, and an almost direct robbery, and that it is rapidly ruining the western farmers; and that by so doing, it must eventually bring about its own cure, by closing the farming lands at the west—thereby not only reducing the quantity and raising the price of provisions, but throwing the former farmers themselves into the labour market, as well as preventing others from settling on new lands.

Now these things, which we have mentioned as affecting Canada, are what we heartily desire to see brought to a close. We must stop the exodus of Canadians to the States; and we must open up our lands to them, and if necessary, we must teach them the art of farming. For by so doing we will give employment to the thousands of half idle labourers, who crowd about our cities and towns and villages, and will put them in a position to earn an independent and honest livelihood, with much more satisfaction to themselves and profit to the country.
