prefion which that action had left upon their minds was of the higheft advantage to the regiment; officers and foldiers became known to each other; they had been engaged in a more ferious manner, and with greater difadvantages than they were likely again to meet with in the common chance of war; and having extricated themfelves moft gallantly from fuch a fituation, they felt themfelves invincible. This fpirit vibrated among them at the time Major Simcoe joined them; and it was obvious, that he had nothing to do but to cherifh and preferve it. Sir William Howe, in confequence of their behaviour at Brandywine, had promifed that all promotions fhould go in the regiment, and accordingly they now took place.

The Queen's Rangers had been originally raifed in Connecticut, and the vicinity of New-York, by Colonel Rogers, for the duties which their name implies, and which were detailed in his commission; at one period they mustered above four hundred men, all Americans, and all Loyalists. Hardships and neglect had much reduced their numbers, when the command of them was given to Colonel French, and afterwards to Major Weymers, to whom Major Simcoe fucceeded; their officers also had undergone a material change; many gentlemen of the fouthern colonies who had joined Lord Dunmore, and diftinguished themselves under his orders, were appointed to superfede those who were not thought competent to the commissions they had hitherto borne; to these were added some volunteers from the army, the whole confifting of young men, active, full of love of the fervice, emulous to diffinguish themselves in it, and looking forward to obtain, through their actions, the honor of being enrolled with the British army.

The Provincial corps, now forming, were raifed on the fuppofed influence which their officers had among their loyal countrymen, and were underftood to be native American Loyalifts; added to an equal chance among thefe, a greater refource was opened to the Queen's Rangers, in the exclusive privilege of enlifting old countrymen

[2]