nests of society. But I must ask your pardon for both this digression. Being seated at my own fireside while roing penning this, I almost forgot that I was writing about ild, I emigration, and a foreign country. I would say tions further, that if government were to employ some of they their idle ships and sailors in transporting those that ademight offer themselves as emigrants, free of expense, vould to any of the British colonies, I apprehend it would elp to have the most salutary effect in relieving the public of great numbers who might do much better abroad those break than they possibly can at home; but unless assisted, ones. they must remain as a burthen, both to themselves se of and others. And in the last place, that all due enwould couragement should be given to those colonies cona this nected with Great Britain, in the way of a reciprocal e cortrade and intercourse, in order to promote their comeep a fort, and secure their best affections, that they may s neat continue faithful and devoted subjects of the mother iature country. would Tam, Sir, &c. ent of nd inthem-

LETTER NINTH.

MAXWELLTOWN, FEB. 20, 1822.

Reverend and Dear Sir,

I could not crowd in, in my last communication, all the things proper yet to be noticed concerning the Island, and also the various articles requisite for accommodating the new settler there.—You will observe I have not yet taken that notice of the fish, animals, and fowls, so as to satisfy the inquisitive reader: One of my reasons for delaying a particular description of each of these was, my fear that I might not have room for inserting what I considered more useful matter. But learning from the Printer that there will yet be room for another Letter, within the bounds fixed upon for the size of the book, I shall continue to write, for I have
