power, the ambition of the monarch of which was to dominate over all, is in complete defeat.

To Retire into Homeland.

Beaten on the field of battle, the edict of the allied chief command is that the German armies shall retire into their own homeland from all invaded territory. Impotent as the German armies shall be, also as impotent shall be the German fleet. Colonies are lost, and the hand that sought to reach out and attain additional territory is withered by the ruling of the supreme war council at Versailles. Reparation and restitution, in fact, full compensation of all kinds, is to be made by Germany for all the disaster that has followed her armies and those of her allies thruout the world war.

The handwriting was on the wall for Germany. Her troops had fought valiantly thruout the more than four years of warfare. But what had been considered in Germany an invincible army was beaten in feats of arms by the allied powers. Even before her allies deserted her, the strength of the allies had become apparent. Unprepared, they had resisted for more than three years the assaults of an enemy who had been preparing for combat since the Franco-Prussian war.

Fighting on the battlefronts ended at 6 e'clock Monday morning. Eastern time, in the United States. The armies of the allied forces at that time—even to the second—were hard harrying the enemy.
The British were fighting their foes across the Belgian frontier in Belgium. The French had all but cleared the Germans from northern France. The Americans were driving northward up the Meuse and Moselle Rivers, threatening the enemy with capitulation by envelopment.
