Before the course could be changed, and while speeding along at a rate of 8 or 10 miles an hour, the vesl struck the rocks with terrible violence, tearing away the plates in the forefoot. Seas were breaking over the 'essel's port beam, and the crew, being on deck, were immersed in the spray of the breakers. Second Officer Howell and two apprentices, Logan and Steele, leaped overboard and were drowned. Confusion reigned supreme. There were not enough life preservers abourd to go

The captain came on deck and ordered the lifeboat manned, but crew would volunteer to take her ashore. Seaman Chamberlain tied a line around his waist, leaped over the ship's side and swam to the beach in the midst of the breakers. It was intensely dark, but occasionally the clouds would part permitting the rays illa, Carpenter, of England; Wilson, of of the moon to reveal the horrors of the disaster. Reaching the shore more dead than alive. Chamberlain made the line fast., but the tossing of the ship broke it. Then Carpenter Paterson and four men volunteered to launch the lifeboat and fasten a line to the ship, and they started off in the darkness toward the shore. The boat got into an eddy and swung around as though on a pivot. Then an incoming breaker hurried it ashore, smashing the frail structure into splinters and throwing the occupants into the sea, some of whom were knocked senseless. Chamberlain went to their rescue and saved two of their lives. The line to the ship was made fast to a tree tightly wedged between rocks. The crew then began landing in the boat-fire was soon built. So soon as som of the stronger men were sufficiently warmed they went out in search of the others. Every few yards the benumbed and senseless bodies of sailors were found, and quickly taken to the fire and restored to consciousness. At day-break the steward was found almost dead, but he managed to say that the captain had died at 10 o'clock the pre vious night. The first officer, who had gone ahead, returned after an all night's tramp in the darkness, and, unable to find shelter, he walked all night to keep from freezing to death. After consultation it was decided to return to the vessel and try to secure food. Half a mile down the trail, buried beneath th freshly fallen snow, the leader of the party accidentally stumbled over the corpse of the captain. Premier Greenway now estimates that out of thirty-two constituencies in which polling takes place Wednesday, the government will carry eighteen, the Patrons two, Conservatives eight and French Liberals four. Were it not for the Patrons making three-cornered contests in seven constituencies, the Conservatives would not get more than four seats; but as only four French conditates. encies, the Conservatives would not get more than four seats: but as only four French candidates and one independent have pronounced themselves in favor of the federal government's policy of remedial legislation, it can pretty safely be said that seven-eights of the people of Manitoba are in favor of the provincial government's school; policy
