A big, strapping, young fellow like a gamekeeper from the cut of his 'velve-teens'—came running d'own from a fine large house, which up to the present I had not noticed, as it was hidden by a clump of iaurels.

'Here, Giles!' the o'd gentleman managed to pant out, 'kick this fellow out on the road—the poaching ruffian!'

I saw there was nothing to be gained by arguing with the irate old party, or coming to loggerheads with the hereulean Giles; so turning on my heel I walked toward the nouse, closely followed by master and man—the former keeping up a brisk fire of anything but complimentary remarks. But there is a limit even to abuse, and from sheer want of breath he had to stop, and left Giles to escort me on to the road.

As we were passing the end of the butter death occurrence of yesterday morning, I think the least open that the bitter remorse you have felt has made; ample amneds for the yesterday morning of the way aid the old gentleman on thing to forgive you for. But there is sone thing I am mest arxious to know from you, and that is the name of your father. There is something in the way you sign your name that brings back to me a flood of sweet and bitter memories. The 'R' in your signature reminds me so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of mine who so of a dear, dear friend of more who is one thing I am mest arxious to know from you aid hat at the Grange, that I had at last to confess to my unc'e, where I spent my time.
