out into a shed and hanged himself. Alberts is a wharf builder and house mover. He has a good reputation and some money. He is a cripple. Irving, the boy who hanged himself, was his youngest son. He was a pupil in the Union street public school, and was in Class A, the highest class in school. He was a studious boy and stood near the head of his class. He never associated with bad boys about town, and spent nearly all the time he was not at school at home doing chores. Often he lent a helping hand in the housework. He was in all ways, according to the neighbors and school teacher, an exemplary boy.

His father was not harsh with him, as a rule, but he sometimes scolded him if he didn't do his work just as he thought it should be done. That was the case the night in question. He was studying his lessons when his father asked him to clean up the room and do some other housework. The boy started to do it, but not in a way to suit his father.

"Irving," said Mr. Alberts, "I wan you to do what I tell you." He then scolded him for not doing the work as he had told him he wanted it dove in the first place. The boy didn't make any reply, but did as he was tord. This was at 8:30 o'clock. He was strough the work and fifteen minutes, and sat down to study again. At 90 clock he was told. This was at 8:30 o'clock. He was through the work in fifteen minutes, and sat down to study again. At 9 o'clock he got up and went out the back door. He hadn't said a worn from the time his father had scolded him, and he didn't speak when he went out. His brother Edward and his father were in the room when he went out. They thought he had just gone to the back yard, and would return in a few minutes. He did not come back, and they went to bed, leaving the door unlocked. Feeling uneasy, however, Edward got up and on entering the shed at the back of the house found his brother I vring hanging by a rope attached to a beam. He was dead. Different explanations are volunteered, but the simplest is that the boy happened to be in a very depressed state of mind, and that he took his father's reprimand deeply to heart.
