

SWEET AS A ROSE.

"You forget," he says in the half-whisper which Paula loves to hear, "that it is five hundred a year with you—a million without you would be of no use. My dear, I know something of life, you'll admit that? Well, then, if I am not mistaken, I am about to begin to live, to be happy to live. Up till now I have only existed. I am going now. The carpenter—an awful man, who scratches his head at every other word—is to meet me at the cottage re-arranging some repairs; and then I am going into the town to look up the man about the furniture. I suppose—wisely—you won't give me any lunch?"

"Certainly not," she retorts, laughing. "We must respect the conveniences. Wait till Alice comes home. Very well," he says, resignedly. "At any rate, you will be ready at six o'clock. I'll expect you for you. Will you give me a kiss?"

She says "No" emphatically enough; but when he bends down and takes her in his arms, her lips meet his.

He goes, reluctantly enough, and Paula stands, shading her eyes and watching him, till the tall figure vanishes in the distance; then, with a smile of perfect happiness on her face, she turns to enter the house. As she does so a voice speaks her name, and looking back she sees someone keeping discreetly behind the rose that trails over the veranda.

For a moment she can scarcely believe her eyes, but she figures come forward cautiously, she stands, and stares, and exclaims:

"Major Vericourt!" in a tone of startled astonishment.

"Hush! My dear young lady, control your surprise," he says, with a hurried nervous glance round the terrace. "I am not a ghost, I assure you."

Though he is certainly not a ghost, the exquisite major is scarcely more than a shadow of his former self.

A change, however, has come over him. With a few surprises, Paula sees that the once upright figure is bent, and that the hand which used to finger the gold-headed cane, the fingers of time, and the thin face, formerly so admirably got up, is marked with wrinkles.

In short, old age, which the major has kept at bay, has come upon him, and has fallen upon him like a relentless enemy upon a besieged town. There is no disputing the awful facts: the major is, at last, an old man.

"I beg your pardon," says Paula gently, but still with a tremor of astonishment; "but—I did not know you were in Powis! Will you come and sit down?"

He comes slowly leaning—actually leaning—upon his stick, and sinks into the chair with a sigh, as of one overcome with fatigue.

Paula notices it.

"Have you walked far, Major Vericourt?" she asks.

"No, my dear young lady," he replies, wiping his face with a handkerchief; "no, my good friend Lord Hurstley, with whom I am staying, kindly lent me his landau to bring me here. I left it at the end of the lane." Then he starts nervously, and adds, with an alarm that is almost comical—"I hope he won't see it."

"He, who?" asks Paula.

"Rick," my dear, my nephew, Rick," he answers, with a tremulous look of pride and fear. "He has gone, my dear, you are sure he has gone?" glancing nervously across at Paula.

"Yes, oh, yes," says Paula. "He has been gone some moments. Did you want to see him?"

"No, no," he answers; then he begins to whisper. "It is a dreadful thing that an old man can't see his only nephew, the boy he has worked and toiled for all his life. Dreadful! Then he recovers himself and turns apologetically. "My dear, I'm an old man; you must forgive me, I didn't want to annoy you."

"You don't annoy me," says Paula, compassionately. "Let me get you some refreshment; you need not be afraid. Sir Herrick is not coming back; for the old man still peers about him apprehensively."

"Thank you, my dear! A glass of water, if you will be so good!"

Paula goes in and brings him a glass of weak brandy and water, and he takes it from the salver with a faint imitation of his old, courtly air.

"Thanks, my dear; a glass of water from your fair hands is nectar indeed," and he bows over the glass, which he lifts to his lips with a trembling hand, setting it down with a sigh.

"I am much changed, my dear young lady," he says, piteously, "much changed. This evening has played the deuce with me. But Rick—my nephew's conduct—has been far worse than this awful climate."

Paula flushes.

"Sir Herrick and I are—are to be married, major," she says resolutely. "You must not say anything against him to me."

"I know, my dear young lady," he responds, with the eagerness of an old man. "And—and I am delighted it should be so; I am indeed, not that—evidently wandering for a moment, and forgetting that I hadn't higher views for the boy. But after all, one must not be too particular; the girl is a lady, and, 'pon my honor, sir, she made a vast improvement at that place, Nouvelle-sur-Mer; appeared as Moonlight and took them all by storm."

Paula flushes.

"You are speaking of me, major," she says gently, her pitiful heart touched by the change in him.

He starts, and looks at her.

"Of course, of course, my dear," he says. "And so you did! And there was no one prouder of you than I was. And I said at the time that Rick was all right; and that you were too good for him."

"Yes, yes," he says eagerly. "But never mind, I'll put that straight." With a cunning smile, "Don't tell Rick just yet, but come closer, my dear—I'll make the rest up. I'm not a rich man as times go, but I can make it up."

Paula shakes her head reluctantly, for she is loath to balk the poor old man in his benevolent intentions.

"Sir Herrick is very proud, major, you know."

"Proud—be-hanged!" he says. "He mustn't know it! Keep it from him!—don't tell him!"

Paula laughs softly.

"But I tell him everything, Major Vericourt," she says. "And I don't think he would accept your kind offer; and it is kind, very kind, and I am very grateful. You had better let us try love in a cottage," she adds, naively.
