Yet now Lowburn was coming to Gisworth, Hester felt no enthusiasm. "I fear," she thought, "he will expect a welcome that is more than just!

a welcome that is more than just friendly."

She busied herself on the Saturday morning, assisting the middle-aged cousin who had come to live with her, but sought no counsel. The steady progress of the hands of the clock irked her. She even felt a sense of grievance against John Whalley, unreasonably blaming him for the one-sided hattle
