

It was reported that the Soviet Union had decided to send a mission to West Germany in order to discuss the possibility of a German-German dialogue.

The mission was led by a high-ranking official and was expected to be a significant step towards normalizing relations between the two Germanys. The Soviet Union had long been a vocal supporter of the German Democratic Republic (DDR) and had been instrumental in its creation. However, in recent years, there had been a growing awareness in the Soviet leadership of the need to address the growing tensions between the two Germanys. The mission was seen as a way to open a dialogue with the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) and to explore the possibility of a German-German dialogue. The mission was expected to be a significant step towards normalizing relations between the two Germanys. The Soviet Union had long been a vocal supporter of the German Democratic Republic (DDR) and had been instrumental in its creation. However, in recent years, there had been a growing awareness in the Soviet leadership of the need to address the growing tensions between the two Germanys. The mission was seen as a way to open a dialogue with the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) and to explore the possibility of a German-German dialogue.

The mission was expected to be a significant step towards normalizing relations between the two Germanys. The Soviet Union had long been a vocal supporter of the German Democratic Republic (DDR) and had been instrumental in its creation. However, in recent years, there had been a growing awareness in the Soviet leadership of the need to address the growing tensions between the two Germanys. The mission was seen as a way to open a dialogue with the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) and to explore the possibility of a German-German dialogue.

The mission was expected to be a significant step towards normalizing relations between the two Germanys. The Soviet Union had long been a vocal supporter of the German Democratic Republic (DDR) and had been instrumental in its creation. However, in recent years, there had been a growing awareness in the Soviet leadership of the need to address the growing tensions between the two Germanys. The mission was seen as a way to open a dialogue with the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) and to explore the possibility of a German-German dialogue.