

ried by a small steamboat, 278; attacked and destroyed when moored to the American shore, 278; affidavit of the captain, 278; report of the British officer, 279; adds the crimes of impressment and abduction to all the other enormities, 279; state of the parties reversed, 279; part of the United States now to complain, 279; communication of Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox, 279; message of President Van Buren to Congress, 279; extracts, 279; feeling in Congress, 280; action of Congress, 280; British government refrains from assuming the act, 280; extract from Capt. Drew's report, 280; reply of McNab to the letter of District Attorney Rogers, 280; remarks of Mr. Fillmore on the reading of the letter, 281; answer to our demand for redress, 281; at near the close of Van Buren's administration the British government had not assumed the act of Capt. Drew, and had not answered for that act, 281; inquiries in the House of Commons relative to it, 282; an important event, 282; arrest of McLeod, 282; a demand from the British Minister for his release, 282; extract, 282; reply of the American Secretary, Mr. Forsyth, 283; extract, 283; British government takes its stand relative to the Caroline after the Presidential election of 1840, 283; queries in the House of Commons, 284; remarks of Mr. Hume, 284; admission of Palmerston, 284; testimony of McNab, 285; remarks, 285; triumph of Palmerston policy, 286; finale of the case, 286; proceedings in the case, 286; action of the administration, 286; discussion in the House on this action, 287; remarks of Mr. Ingersoll, 287; "this in its national aspect is precisely the same as if it had been perpetrated in a house," 287; demand of the British, 287; Mr. Fox's letter is a threatening one, 287; a deplorable lapse from the position Mr. Webster first assumed, 288; our position is false, lamentably false, 288; never did man lose a greater occasion than Mr. Webster cast away, 288.

Success of the British Ministry in this experiment, 289; another trial, 289; Mr. Adams in defence of the administration, 289; Mr. Cushing on the same side, 289; remarks on their speeches, 289; the case of the Poles and of the Hungarians, 290; Butler's reply to Cushing, 290; the fashion of the friends of Webster, 291.

Speech of Senator Benton, 291; "the history of our country full of warning to those who take the side of a foreign country against their own, 291; humiliating to see Senators of eminent ability consulting books to find passages to justify an outrage upon their own country, 292; what is the case before us? 293; a statement, 293; further statement, 294; a conclusive point settled, 294; position of the British Ministry known on March 4th, 295; action of the new administration, 295; letter of Mr. Fox, 295; instructions of Mr. Webster to the Attorney General, 295; extract, 295; proceedings of the Attorney General, 296; duties of the Attorney General, 296; the correctness and propriety of the answer given to Mr. Fox the main point in the case, 297; the instructions erroneous in point of law, derogatory to us in point of character, and tending to the degradation of the republic, 298; the law of nations, 298; derogatory to our character, 299; example of Walpole's foreign policy, 300; the instructions to the Attorney General most unfortunate and deplorable, 300; the letter to Mr. Fox from the Secretary of State, 301; an unfortunate production, 301; its faults fundamental and radical, 302; abandonment of our claim, 302; further remarks," 303, 304.

RIVES, WILLIAM C., in defence of the veto of the bank bill, 322; on the disorder in the Senate gallery, 351-352.

RODGER, COMMODORE, decease of.—His appearance, 144; hero, by nature, 144; sketch of his life, 144; American cruisers in the last war, 145; views of the Government on the employment of the public vessels, 145; Rodger's opinion, 146; his naval exploits, 146; his humanity, 147; feelings at the death of Docatur, 147; death, 148.

SALT.—Speech of Mr. Benton, 176; perhaps the most abundant substance of the earth, 176; the universality of the tax on it, 177; a salt tax was not only politically, but morally wrong, 177; a tax upon the entire economy of nature and art, 177; determination to effect its repeal, 173.

SANTA ANNA.—His remark relative to Commander McKenzie.

His downfall.—His return expected to secure a peace with Mexico, 709; the sword, and not the olive branch, returned to Mexico, 709; capture of Mexico put an end to his career, 710; in three months, the treaty signed, 710; the acquisitions, 710; the payments, 710; a singular conclusion of the war, 710; the treaty a fortunate event, 710; manner in which those who served the Government fared, 711.

SAUNDERS, ROMULUS M., moves the adoption of the two-thirds rule in the democratic convention, 501.

SCHLOSSER, Harbor of the steamboat Caroline, 278.

SEWARD, WILLIAM H., answer to the interrogatories of an anti-slavery meeting, 776.

SLADE, WILLIAM, on abolition petitions, 176.

Slavery agitation, progress of.—Movement against slavery, in the session of 1837-38, 134; memorial from Vermont against the annexation of Texas, and for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, 134; petitions, &c., 134; little excuse, 134; state of the case, 134; residence of the petitioners, 134; subject of the petitions disagreeable, 134; leading to an inevitable separation of the States, 134; remarks of Mr. Calhoun, 134; question on the most judicious mode of treating these memorials, 135; the course adopted, to lay the question of reception on the table, 135; Calhoun endeavors to obtain, from the Senate, declarations which should cover all the questions of federal power over the institution of slavery, 135; his resolutions, 135; the fifth, 135; the dogma of "no power in Congress to legislate upon the existence of slavery in territories," had not then been invented, 135; reference to the Missouri Compromise line, 136; Calhoun's remarks on this compromise, 136; remarks, 136; Clay's substitute, 137; further proceedings, 137; repugnance of the Senate to the movement, 138; remarks of senators on the tendency of the resolutions to aggravate the excitement, 138; justification of Calhoun, 139; action of the Senate and the House, 140; the important part of the debate, 140; remarks on Calhoun's views of the Missouri Compromise, 140.

Remarks of Calhoun on the ordinance of 1787, in the Oregon bill, 141; three propositions laid down by him, 141; their conflict with the power exercised by Congress, in the establishment of the Missouri Compromise, 141; his views in the Cabinet, 141; old writings produced, 141; denial of Mr. Calhoun that Monroe's Cabinet was consulted on the subject, 142; circumstances favoring the denial, 142; views of Calhoun in 1820, in 1837-38, and in 1847-48, 142; changes in his opinions on the constitutional power of Congress, 143; remarks, 143; records of the Department of State, 143.

In the House, a most angry and portentous debate, 150; motion on the subject of petitions and memorials