In this reduction the adoption of the Canadian Fog Signal Company's diaphones has been one of the main fac-tors. Nor should the more important service that is rendered in saving human life be forgotten. In preventing one such wreck as has too often occur-red in the past, the government has performed a service that cannot be neasured even at the total cost of the quipment which it has purchased. It is fair to the government to say that no more practical testing and consideration was ever given to any appliance before its adoption than was given to this. The adoption of the diaphone was the result of the most careful consideration, not by any political interest, but by an honest and capable official—a man whose professional standing and reputation are recognized by the foremost English authorities.
