Vida had nurtured a forlorn hope rebound. She did not believe him would be cleared at the trial, and that he would afterward win his election. What a triumph it would be to win his heart now while it was turned against Lynette by her supposed un faithfulness-to win him now and governor! Lynette would be married and gone, so there would be nothing to prevent the success of her crafty schemes.

So, while Vida pretended at home to believe that Stephen Belcourt was a monster, she was secretly writing him sweet little notes of sympathy. She had never received any reply to them but she cherished a secret hope that the notes were gradually softening night to God to let something happen her an answer.

To find out so suddenly that he saw through her plans and despised her exposed to the contempt of such wo-Lynette, was humiliation unbear-

Now indeed her love for Stephen Belcourt turned to genuine hate-the cruel hatred of a woman scorned. The

There was a pause, then Myrtle said;

Belcourt and the girl he loved-ill, Meanwhile, Lynetic and Myrtle were left alone together, and the former

"Is it possible that Vida can have acted such a deceitful part?"

Myrtle laughed, and replied: "It is entirely true, for I have seen the dreary autumn landscape, while on her face was too plain to be mistaken. You see, she's in love with for revenge. On the beg and chairs Mr Belcourt herself, and took that way to win him, while pretending to arrived from New York by express you that she believed him a monster." ly: "How could anyone be so wicked and deceitful?" cried Lynette indig-

> Myrtle smiled again at her surprise, and answered truthfully:

"There are plenty of people in th world as bad and even worse than ploy deceit, like Vida, to win the man they love, and, more's the pity, they often succeed in their designs. Fortunately. Stephen Belcourt is not weak and easily flattered, like some men, so he did not fall into the cun

"How glad I am that she has failed!" exclaimed Lynette: then she osy glow overspread her face and neck: "I would give the world to know if-he cares for me still!"

Myrtle reproachfully.

"But, Myrtle, I am not married to him yet, you know, and I pray every Graham Prentiss. Still, perhaps Stephen Belcourt does not care for And Lynette clasped her dimpled white hands despairingly, and looked at her friend with a mute question in

Suppose, dear Lynette, that you go home with me to-morrow for

'Agreed, if Uncle Jack will give ne leave,' answered Lynette, to whom he prospect was very welcome. So at supper Uncle Jack was attacked by the united persuasions of the two girls, and yielded a reluctant consent, coerced into it by Lynette's laughing threat: 'If you don't consent, I shall run off, Uncle Jack.'

Perhaps he feared she would carry out her threat, perhaps he had already been as harsh with her as he dared to be, and feared the disapproval of gossiping neighbors. At any rate, he ermitted the visit, against the remontrances of his better half

'You'll repent this, John Henry Lewis!' she cried angrily, when they were all alone that night. Do hush your clatter, he returned peevishly Mrs. Lewis tied the strings of her nightcap with a vicious jerk, and hiss-

'Don't blame me when you hear of Lynette's riding all over the country with that bold Miss Dare, begging all the men for votes for Stephen Bel-

The farmer broke into one of his jovial laughs, and exclaimed careless-

Lynette wouldn't be suck a fool!' 'She wouldn't, eh? Well, if she showed much sense, she wouldn't be kin to you! And it's what a big lot of the silly woman folks are doing, anyway-riding around and trying to create a sentiment in his favor, so as to get him elected. The Belcourts and Dares are at the top of the whole thing, and no doubt they'll drag Lyn ette into the mess-perhaps marry her to him out of hand !'

Well. I kain t help it ef they do, ill, so, for mercy's sake, stop your awing, and let a fellow get some couldn't deny Lynette's going. The Dare girl would have spread it, and the hull neighborhood would have say-not that I b'heve a word on't- this foul conspiracy. I'll up and write to Edgar Lewis to come home and manage his stster.'

So it happened that Edgar Lewis received two letters within one week -the first from Myrtle Dare; the second, four days later, from his

The first one thrilled him with oleasure, because it came from his bonny sweetheart, though it also aroused in him keen dissatisfaction, because Myrtle openly and warmly and its suburbs, the Directory contain espoused the cause of Stephen Bel-

Stephen Belcourt is no more guilty of the crime imputed to him than you are, Edgar,' she wrote warmly, 'There are many who de not believe that Madge McDonale was murde:ed at all -- everythin points to suicide-but I need not dwell on that, for, of course, you have read the evidence. I can only say that all my sympathies are with Stephen Belcourt, and his people are my friends. He is innocent, and, though appearances are against him now, I an blame him?" cried Lynette, in believe that ere long he will b triumphantly vindicated.

> 'True, he is in prison on a terrible charge. But-who is his accuser? 'Only one person, and he a man of such low moral character that his word can scarcely be taken on oath 'Is a man like Stephen Belcourt, a
