Where to Buy Your Meats
The Coming Summer.

In the winter months when all the markets are cold and the dust is not so prevalent on the streets, cleanliness is not so difficult to secure as during the summer months. It is about now that particular people look more carefully into the matter of cleanliness and decide where they are going to buy their meats during the summer months.

We want you to come here and let us show you just how we are being up in this respect—concrete floors that are washed up, not swept, refrigeration so arranged that meats can be run in when not being used, and all other modern sanitary methods and conveniences are provided.

You read of some merchant who had his store completely destroyed by fire, on which he carried very little, if any insurance. With what fate regard he remembers how persistently he refused insurance protection.

Nothing but blackened ruins of all that was once a flourishing business. Take a mental picture of this condition; should insurance place you in such a position, very little sympathy would be shown you for this loss of efficient business methods your action is unwarranted and irresponsible.

An insurance policy does more than safeguard you in case of loss—it insures the per-

VISION.

He was a lonely cobbler, and he wrought Within a tiny room one summer day.
When a kind wanderer of the soil did say:
"Do you not feel good at bedtime draught In this dim place?" Thence the cobbler brought.

He took a window that looked out on the sea When I am weary, that doth comfort me These boundless spaces away with wonder fraught.

Like to that kindly man we oft have sighed For human lives that mean—and measure grow And then would open for them a window wide Through which across the dust a breeze might blow.

Freedom of soul and so what life Beyond the circle of time's mighty axis flow.

CHAPTER VIII.
Renunciation.

I was on the girl's fifteenth birthday. They had come up to the top of the ridge, and he and she fought the missionary to gather red sprigs of the balsam for the festival that they were to have in the cabin that night. High up on the side of a jagged rock Jan saw a bit of the crimson vine thrusting itself out into the sun, and with Melisse laughing and encouraging him from below, he climbed up until he had secured it.
He tossed it down to her.

"You can't catch me," he cried, peering his disadvantage, "and I'm going home." Jan clenched his steps. It was a joy to see Melisse springing from rock and shrub as she came towards him, her hair blowing and swaying out in the wind, her slender figure flashing with the gleam of the pale sun shadows that ran up and down the mountain.

He would not have overheard her of his own choosing, but at the foot of the ridge Melisse gave up. Never had he seen her so beautiful, still daring him with her laugh, cunning and pouting, flinging back her hair. Half reaching out his arms, he cried:

"Melisse, you are beautiful—you are almost a woman! If you did your hair up like the pictures we have in the books you would be a woman," he answered softly. "You are more beautiful than the pictures."

"You say that I am pretty and that I am almost a woman," she pouted.
"And yet," she shrugged her shoulders at him in mock disdain. "Jan Thoreau, this is the third time in the last week that you have not played the game right. I won't play with you any more!"

In a flash he was at her side, her face between his two hands, and bending down, he kissed her upon the mouth.

"There," she said as he released her.
"Isn't that the way we have played it since I can remember? Whenever you catch me you may have that."

"I am afraid, Melisse," he said sophistically, "you are growing so tall and so pretty that I am afraid."

"Afraid! My brother afraid to kiss me! And what will you do when I get to be a woman, Jan, which will be very soon, you say?"

"I don't know, Melisse." She turned her back to him and fingering her hair, and Jan, who had done this same thing for her a hundred times before, divided the silken mass into three strands and plaited them into a braid.

"I don't believe that you care for me as much as you used to, Jan. I wish I were a woman, so that I might know if you are going to forget me entirely."

"Shoulders crumpled, and when he had finished his task he found that she was laughing and that her eyes were swimming with a new mischief which was trying to hide from him.
In that laugh there was something which was not like Melisse.
Slightly as the change was noticed it but, instead of displeasing him, it set a vague sensation of pleasure tugging at his heart.

"I understand," replied Jan in a low voice. "I understand and I praise the blessed Virgin that it was Jean de Gravola who killed the missioner out post the last of last year."

"But the other," persisted Jan, "the other, which says that I—" "Stop!" cried Jean sharply. "He came around the table and edged Jan's hands in the iron grip of his knee, brown fingers. "That is something for you to forget. It makes nothing—nothing at all, Jan Thoreau! Does any one know but you and me?"

"No one. I intended that some day Melisse and her father should know about the table and edged Jan's hands in the iron grip of his knee,
brown fingers. "That is something for you to forget. It makes nothing—noth-

"And today in this cabin you will forget again, and you will bury it deep that it will never come back. I am proud of you, Jan Thoreau. I love you, and it is the first time that Jean de Gravola has ever said this of a man. Ah, I hear them coming!"

roll which he had taken from his pocket. One by one he handed the pages out to Jean de Gravola.

"My God!" said Jean, when he had finished reading. "He spoke no other words. 'White faced,' the two men stared, Jan's throat twitching. Gravola brown fingers crushing the rolls he held.

"That was why I tried to kill the missioner," said Jan at last. "And that—that is why it could not signify that Melisse has done up her hair."

"He gathered up the papers so that they shot back into the little cylinder-shaped roll again.
