"A work of which British enterprise, British art and science, may well be proud, for all three have combined in the production of a book of travel in some respects almost unrivalled in the rich record of British exploration. Certainly the illustrations . . . have never been excelled, and seldom equalled, for accuracy and artistic finish, except in such classic works as those of the Bewicks and Gould. . . . The text of this delightful work is as apt as to the naturalist, traveler, and to the ordinary reader—is, generally speaking, quite worthy of its splendid embellishments."—A. H. KEANE: Acad., xxxi, 51.

"It is a model work of travel."—Ath., No. 3119.

"There is a vein of humour running through nearly the whole narrative which is delightful when caught. . . . Though almost every chapter proves the writer to be a man of scientific taste and ability, the general reader will not find enough science to daunt him."—Spectator, ix, 187.
