the requirements of the war as we have to finding fault with each other, things would be very different from what they are to-day. This war is far from being over. The submarines are taking a very heavy toll of the mercantile marine; this week 27 or 28 of the largest British ships of the line have been sunk. The men at the front need help; the situation is serious. I believe that the House should put this measure through as quickly as possible and that both sides of the House should get behind it and make it successful. We should present a united front in obtaining the 100,090 men, or whatever number is required, drilling them, equipping them and getting them to the firing line thus saving many lives and perhaps, may terially shortening the war.
