A COUSIN IN NEED.
On a dreary autumn day, more than one hundred years ago, a heavy traveling carriage was slowly lumbering along the muddy road from Potsdam to Berlin.
Within it was one person only, who took no heed of the slowness of the traveling; but leaning back in a corner, was arranging a multiplicity of papers contained in a small portfolio, and making notes in a pocketbook. Since he was dressed in a plain dark military uniform, it was fair to suppose that this gentleman belonged to the Prussian army, but to which grade of it nobody could determine, as all taken of rank had been avoided.

A dreary November evening was closing in; and though the rain had for a time ceased, yet dark masses of clouds flying through the sky gave warning that a "weeping darkness" was at hand.
The rain grew heavier and heavier—at last so it should have seemed to a foot traveler who was plunging his way through its mire; and so, "outlets," it did seem to the carriage horses who at last floundered along so slowly that the passenger, whom they had overtaken, kept easily by the side of the coach, though at a respectful distance—certainly after the first bucketful of mud that it splashed over him.

The gentleman inside the coach, when he could see no longer, said to his wife, "I am tired and want to get out of this place." The lady replied, "I am not tired, but I am sick and want to get out of this place."

FRANK MASSON.
Newcastle 7 July 24, 1894.

Heinrich deliberately examined the white sheet and after a short pause held it up before the congregation, saying:
"His majesty has furnished the text for my sermon. But you may perceive that nothing whatever is upon this sheet of paper. 'Out of nothing God created the world.' I shall therefore take the Creation for the subject of my discourse this morning."

In accordance with this decision the preacher went through the whole of the first chapter of Genesis in a masterly way, his style being forcible and clear and his diction of language remarkable. His audience accustomed to the King's eccentricities, were far more astounded at the dexterity with which the preacher extolled himself from the difficulty than at the dilemma in which he had been placed. At last the sermon was ended, the congregation dismissed and Heinrich found himself in the sacristy, receiving the congratulations of several dignitaries of the church, who all prophesied for him a brilliant future.

Heinrich ventured to express his amazement at the singular proceeding of the king, but was told that he could only have arrived recently from the province if he did not know that such vagaries were common to his majesty.
In the midst of the conversation a messenger arrived to conduct him to the royal presence. Being totally unaware what impression his sermon might have made upon the king, the cousin seeker rather dreaded the approaching audience.

But Heinrich had scarcely crossed the threshold of the king's room when his majesty jumped up and thrust a roll of paper into the young man's hand, exclaiming, "Hurrah, sir, put away! Take this light for the light you gave me!"

Throwing himself back in a chair he laughed heartily at the young preacher's look of surprise and confusion. The latter scarcely knew what reply to make, or what to do but just as he got as far as "Your Majesty—" the king interrupted him saying:

"Make no fine speeches; go home quietly and examine the contents of the paper. You came to Berlin to seek a cousin; you have found one, if you go on steadily, will not neglect you." It is hardly necessary to add that the roll of paper contained a good appointment to the University of Berlin and made Heinrich Meyer one of the royal preachers.—X.

THE FORTRESS AT GIBRALTAR.
Up above, where the signal station is, and where no one, not even an officer in uniform, not engaged on the works, is allowed to go are the real fortifications.
What looks like a rock is a monster gun painted grey, or a tree hides the mouth of another. And in this forbidden place are great cannons, which are worked from the lowest of chambers.
Before they came, the clouds which shut out the sight of the rock as well as the test of the world from its summit rendered the great pieces of artillery there as useless in bad weather as they are harmless in times of peace. The very elements threatened to war against the English, and a shower of rain or a veer-ing wind might have altered the fortunes of a battle. But a clever man named Watkins has invented a position fixed, by means of which those on the lowest ramparts, well out of the clouds can aim the great guns on the summit at a vessel sunk by the gunners lost in the mist above, and by electricity fire a shot from a half-mile above them so that it will strike an object many miles off at sea.
It will be a very strange sensation to the latter could give him no further information: all he could do was to promise that if the king sent the text through him it should be forwarded with the utmost possible dispatch.

That day and the next passed and yet Heinrich heard nothing from either king or marshal. Only an official intimation had been sent, as was customary, that he had been selected as the preacher on the following Sunday at the chapel royal.

If it had not been that Heinrich knew himself to be possessed of no mean power of oratory, and could even extemporize in case of emergency, he would certainly have run away from Berlin and allured his discovered cousin.
As it was he abided the course of events and fortified himself by prayer and philosophy for the momentous hour.
Sunday morning arrived, but no text.
Heinrich went to the church appointed, and was conducted to the seat appart for the preacher of the day.

The service commenced, but no text!
The prayers were ended, and whilst the organ pealed forth its solemn sounds the Heinrich was led to the pulpit. The congregation were astonished, not only at his youthfulness, but his ringing utterance. The pulpit steps were gained and the thought dashed across Heinrich's mind that possibly he should find the text placed for him on the desk. But as he was on the point of mounting the pulpit, an officer of the royal household delivered him a folded piece of paper, saying, "His majesty sends you the text."

After having recited the preliminary prayer, the preacher opened the paper and lo! it was blank; not a word was written on it. What was to be done?

reception was most favorable. The Marshal begged him to be seated at the table at which he was sitting, and proceeded at the same time to business.
Unlocking a drawer and bringing forth small sheets of paper, he asked Heinrich, as he drew them forth one by one, if he knew whose handwriting the various superscriptions were!

Heinrich answered that to the best of his belief one was that of Herr Muller, his former school-teacher, another that of Dr. Von Hummer, principal of such a college, and so on.

"Quite right," answered the Marshal,
"and perhaps it may not surprise you to hear that I have written to three different gentlemen to inquire your character, that I know with whom I have to deal, and not be working in the dark."

As he said these words the Marshal fixed his eyes on Heinrich to see what effect they had; but the young man's countenance was unabashed; he evidently feared no evil report.

"I feel bound," continued the Marshal,
is most favorable, and I feel equally bound to believe and act upon their opinions, I have only to beg of you to follow me to a friend's house."

The Marshal descended a private staircase leading to the court-yard, crossing which he passed through a gate in the wall into a narrow side street, down which he continued. Heinrich till they arrived at a private entrance to the palace. Heinrich began to get exasperated; the conviction that his idea was not a mere trick of imagination became stronger and stronger. Could he be at that moment have been forty miles from Berlin. At last, as he found himself following Grumkow even into the palace, he could not refrain from exclaiming, "Indeed, Herr Marshal, there must be some mistake!"

No answer was vouchsafed, as the Marshal continued to lead him through the various galleries and apartments, until at last they reached the door of one situated in a corner of a wing of the palace, where the Marshal's knock was answered by a short "come in."

As the door opened a glance sufficed to convince Heinrich that his friend in the mud and his wings, were one and the same person. The prince, confused, knelt before Frederick William, and began faltering out contrite apologies.

"Rise, young man," said the king, "you have not committed treason. How could you guess who I was? I should not have guessed if I meant to be everywhere required!"

After reassuring Heinrich the king told him that he was preparing to do what he could to push him forward in the profession he had chosen. "But first," he said, "I must hear you preach." Sunday next, therefore, you shall preach before me, but mind, I shall choose the text. You may retire.

By the time Heinrich Meyer reached his own room in the inn, he had fixed in his mind the fact that he was to preach before the king. The fact was only too clear, and all he could do was to set his sermon as soon as he should be furnished with the text. For the remainder of the day he never stirred out; every step on the stairs was to him that of the bearer of the text.

Nevertheless evening and night passed and the next day was far advanced, but still no text.

What was to be done? There was only two days before Sunday. He must go and consult the Marshal, but
the utmost possible dispatch.

his belief one was that of Herr Muller,

ly feared no evil report.

"I feel bound," continued the Marshal,

which
