Gradually this never ending worry affects the secretions of her stomach and bowels, disturbs the proper elimnation of waste products from the system, affects the caliber of her blood, until dyspepsia, with its brood of attendant miseries, claims her for its own. Insominia proves a strong ally of dyspepsia and makes life at night even more miserable than does dyspepsia by day.

Finally her mind to stand even the suggestion of a mental strain and the heart action is so weakened that one sad day, some shock, which she is unable to withstand, will finisher her. I was reading the other day of an interview of a woman with her physician. She was telling him, in a tragic manner of her perpetual worries. The doctor's eves twinkled as he said to her: 'My dear woman, what a pitty that you don't possess a keener sense of humour. It is a wonderful help in this daily life of ours. If you could train yourself to see the ludricous side of things, by the time you had worried over your husband's comings and goings a few times you would be so amused at your ungrounded fears and anxiety that you would have terest in our Regiment and in fact in broken away from the nervous ten-

Its vibrations seem to force new life into the very springs of our being. And it is an accepted fact that cheerfulness and pleasureable emotions have a happy influence on the process of digestion.
