CHAPTER XX.

Four days had passed and Lillias had sent no letter or message regarding the projected meeting. These days George had spent within doors in the cottage in the hollow, excepting the time taken in his morning walk to the south lodge. Daily as the morning came round he presented himself in Mrs Rendal's kitchen, and on each occasion his countenance expressed the eager hope that the good lady was charged with the expected message. A loving message she indeed had on each occasion from Lillias, but no intimation that a meeting could be arranged. "At the words of affection which Mrs Rendal had been commissioned to carry never failed to be supplemented with a request that George would excuse his patience a little longer, for she hoped that soon the hour of meeting would arrive."

At length, on the fifth morning, the joyful summons came. George divined the happy fact by a look at Mrs Rendal's animated face—even before the letter was drawn from her bosom.

"At last," exclaimed George, as eagerly he seized the letter.

"Ay, sir, at last," said Mrs Rendal.

"And when?" he demanded, as he, with fluttering hands, was opening the envelope.

"This very night; but the letter will tell you."

And so it did, though with startling brevity.

"Dear George,—To-night at eight, at the arbour where we parted.—Yours ever, LILLIAS."

This was all, but it was enough; and George went back to Matthew Greigson's with his soul raised to the third heaven of delight.

That day seemed by far the longest that he had ever spent in the cottage. When a man takes to counting hours and minutes, these appear to be very slow in passing, and they did so now to the impatient youth whose heart longed for the moment when he would be by the side of Lillias.

With what tantalizing deliberation did the old clock tick out the seconds; how the striking of each hour seemed to draw itself lingeringly out, as if taking pleasure in prolonging his feverish anxiety. Once and again he had to go in the passage to satisfy himself that he had not counted wrong. At length the clear cold light of the winter day began visibly to decline and twilight drew on.

Between twilight and eight o'clock several hours of darkness had still to pass, and theiredium had to be endured. He managed to wait till between six and seven, but longer he could not remain indoors, so, encesing himself in his great-coat, he nodded good-bye to Matthew and Allie, and went out.

The moon had not risen, nor would it rise till late, but the stars shone clearly overhead, and the night was anything but dark. There had been a thaw of two days' duration, under the influence of which the greater portion of the snow had disappeared, and what remained lay in white patches in the hollows and on the north-side of the trees and fences. He had already decided that he would go through the park to the place of rendezvous. He therefore crossed the swollen stream by the wooden footbridge, and ascended the ravine by one of the many winding paths.

He was now on the Ardowan estate, and before moving out into the open ground looked carefully round to see that no one was near, since it was important that in the circumstances he should not be observed, and least of all by Nathan Garrett, whose way homeward from the mansion lay in this direction.

Breakfast—Epps's Cocoa—Grateful and Comforting.—By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills.—Civil Service Gazette. Made simply with boiling water or milk. Each packet is labelled "James Epps & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also, makers of Epps's Milky Cocoa (Cocoa and Condensed Milk).

Many persons apparently healthy on retiring die during the enervating hours from three to five in the morning. The life force being lowest at the time nature more readily succumbs. Individuals on the shady side of forty, and whose vitality has been impaired are most susceptible. Epps's Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites will sustain and tone the nervous system, and its use is a necessary precaution against premature mortality.
