From John her thoughts turned to Diana Wentworth, this teasing creature, of whom John had told her, but whom she have never seen, and whom she had rather had seen than any other woman in the world, not excepting the Queen herself.
Time passed. The fire glowed, and the clock ticked. Although the rain made no sound, Susan knew it was raining, and she wondered what made John so late; it did not usually take him so long to go to Keld and back.
Five minutes later she heard his step and his voice, and she laid down her work to listen. To whom could he be speaking?
visitors never came to Becktop farm, and then she heard another voice reply, and she rose from her chair with fast-beating heart and a curious thrill passing through her.
For it was a woman's voice, and she knew whose it was.

John came in first, Diana following, with dazed eyes and a sudden feeling of shyness.
John looked stern yet appy.

way are you going? It's all dark; I don't know where I am."

"Where do you wish to go to?"
She put her hand to her head; she felt dizzy and confused; but for his support she must have fallen.

"I don't know; I can't think," she answered, in a faint, broken voice. "Not to the Abbey—anywhere else."

"You are not fit to walk," he said; "but my house is close by—can you walk a very little way? You will be safe there, and can tell me just what you please."

"Oh, thank you. Yes, let me go there."
They walked on a little way, slowly and heavily, each step costing her a great effort, and then she said,
"You always come when I am in trouble. Why are you here? Where were you going?"
"I was going home, I had been to Keld. Some people are staying at the inn there, and my cousin Susan supplies them with farm stuff. To-day she was busy with other things, and I saw it was going to rain, so I took the basket from her. I was coming home, and getting through the stile I saw something on the ground. It did not move. I touched it and found it was human—a woman—and I spoke. You answered."

They walked on a little way, slowly and heavily, each step costing her a great effort, and then she said, "You always come when I am in trouble. Why are you here? Where were you going?" I'was going home; I had been to Keld. Some people are staying at the inn there, and my cousin Susan supplies them with the farm stuff. To-day she was busy with other things, and I saw it was going to rain, so I took the basket from her. I was coming home, and getting through the stile I saw something on the ground. It did not move. I touched it and found it was human—a woman—and I spoke. You answered."

She gave him an outline of what had happened to herself. She was tired and wak, and there were long pauses between her words, but she told enough to enable him to understand what had taken place. At the end she repeated that she would not return to the Abbey.

"You must not go back," he said, in the authoritative tone he had often used in speaking to her at Jacewo. "In another minute we shall be at my house, and it is well, for I see you can walk no further. My cousin will attend to you and prepare you a room. Take no further thought for anything until to-morrow, when you will be rested and able to think."

As he spoke they turned a corner and heard the rush of the stream, the thunder of the fall, below them. John pushed open a gate and led her up a garden path to the door.

Susan had been busy all day, and it had been a great relief to her when John offered to carry her basket of butter and eggs and fowls to Keld. She watched him go, and could not repress a smile at the contrast of his unfarmerlike appearance and the rusticity of the errand on which he was bound. But it was a proud and tender smile, and there was a moisture in her eyes as a she turned away murmuring:

"Her work was done by six o'clock and it had overlived."

Stick to the Right.

Right actions spring from right principles. In cases of diarrhea, dysentery, cramps, colic, summer complaint, cholera morbus, etc., the right remedy is Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry—an unfailing cure—made on the principle that nature's remedies are best. Never travel without it.

Life has many ills, but the mind that views every object in its most cheering aspect, and every doubtful dispensation as replete with latent good, bears within itself a powerful and perpetual antidote. The gloomy soul aggravates misfortune, while a cheerful smile often dispels those mists that portend a storm.

Susan," letting his eyes fall on his cousin's wonder-struck face, "this is Miss Wentworth, whom I have brought in out of the rain; can you find her some dry things?"

Many women would have resented such an introduction; but, besides the fact that John was emphatically "master in his own house," it never entered Susan's head to say him nay.

She came forward to the girl, who stood near the door as though only half certain of her welcome and right to enter, and said, "Will you come to the fire Miss Wentworth, please?"

"You are Mr. Garthwaite's cousin;" asked Diana, as she came up to the glowing fire."
