Adam Graeme, of Mossgray.

Just then the Laird of Mossgray began to use how it fared with the one guest whose presence Lilias had desired, and in his grace-ul old-world courtesy he drew near to releave her. As he passed on to Helen's corner, is attention was claimed at every step; but Mossgray passed through the happier groups, unlingly parrying the attacks made upon bim.

She was not if after; he could see, even in this and with that the irritation which poor Walter Buchanan would have to spur to this elastic nature; and rowald, strongly as he held by all prieties, could not but smile to think commonplace projer round hims g down" upon Helen.

"And drawn me with breastplate and rusy spear," said Lilias, "about to set out $20,000,000. The minds Hope of the Laird's Jock, and his sends us the

the armed men who were going forth, with a peradvonture that they would never return; and the Lily of Mossgray would do honor to Hope's fancy, if the painter had thought of her as the Laird's Lilias."

As she ceased she slightly turned her head. The banker was looking in eagerly—looking at her. As their eyes met, both withdrew hastily; Helen with a tingling thrill of shy pride, and Mr. Oswald with a complication of fe-lings difficult to describe. Strong determination not to yield, strangely mingled with an absolute liking for the girl who praised his Hope so kindly, and to whom Hope clung with such affection. It was a very sudden feeling, but his eyes followed her unawares, almost with pride. William too was looking proudly after the rapid figure in the distance. Hope, at home, was thinking proudly, that no one in Fendie or in Edinburgh was like Helen Buchanain and the banker, in his secret heart, acknowledged that they were right, while again he
