instantly, while she thought the gentle girl was just as lovely as she could be.

It seemed as if she had been undergoing some refining process during the last two years, which had rendered her beauty more delicate and her manners more winning. She had been charmed with her from the first moment of their meeting, and there was not the slightest feeling of envy or bitterness in her heart toward her for having so unceremoniously stepped into the home and fortune which for so many years she had regarded as hers; instead, she began immediately to love her with an affection almost equal to that which she had entertained for Miss McAllister. After they had taken tea they 'ed her upstairs.

"You must rest," Miss McAllister said, with an anxious look at the face, which was fast losing the color which

And she obeyed, beginning with what had transpired upon her wedding day, and giving a truthful account of all that she had suffered from the man who should have been a faithful provider and a tender protector.

The old lady's face grew pale and stern as she listened, and she thanked the fates that she had not made known her intentions regarding the future dispositions of her property before the pair had left home.

She had resolved to settle a handsome income on Arley, after seeing how nobly she had borne herself upon learning that she was not Captain Wentworth's child; she had been almost tempted to do it when she had sent for Mr. Holley to make over her fortune to Ina; but she rejoiced now that she had not done so, for she b lieved that Philip would have conti ned to live in idleness, and perha
