trend of office buildings and retail bus!ness is not likely to go south of the Grand Trunk. It seems fairly certain that it will go north as far as it is able. Richmond street will never become a Ridout street, nor Wellington street a Richmond street, in the opinion of businessmen. Richmond street will go north as far as it can, but there are churches and other institutions to break the links on one side. The west side is now almost a continuous row of stores as far north as Oxford. The remarkable growth of the north end is bound to cause a steady march of improvement in the business aspect of Richmond street

Wellington street looms as a possible 'main street' in the minds of some people. But can it realize the hopes that are entertained for it. McClary's have the south end of it cornered on one side. The other side may flourish, and then the federal square will be encountered. On the block between Dundas and Queen's avenue there are an insurance building, apartment houses, the Y. M. C. A. and the public library—quite a number of solid institutions to be dis-

The next block on Wellington street is practically residential, and then comes the park, ranged by its magnificent out-guard of homes. A block further and the C. P. R. puts up its hand and forbids advance (thanks to the rare judgment of some past city fathers, who should have been hauled up for non-

Wellington and Richmond Streets. So that Wellington street does not threaten the crown of Richmond street, not seriously, at least. Richmond street is the home of so many important institutions that it is practically impreg-nable. For instance, practically all the banks in the city are located on this thoroughfare; it is the street of business offices. It will take many years to dislodge the connections provided, such as the market and the railways, by the city's end of the Proof line.

Concentration on the present business district, with a gradual filling up of such blocks as King street, Ridout street, York street and the smaller cross streets provide, would seem to be the most natural trend of building, with Dundas street steadily advancing where the property is available, and Richmond street showing rapid improvement by the replacement of many of the present buildings north of Dundas.
