

the respondent what he was going to "tax him," and the reply was, "nothing." This was not inconsistent with the arrangement having been what the Chancellor found that it was. If the boy had been taken away at that time, the respondent would have been saved the expense of bringing him up, and he might well say that, in such circumstances, he expected nothing for the two years' care that the boy had been given.

The damages were assessed upon too liberal a scale: in the circumstances, $40 a year on the average would be adequate compensation for the care and bringing up of the boy during the seven years for which the Chancellor thought that compensation should be allowed.

The judgment should be varied by reducing the damages to $280; but the disposition of the costs of the action should not be disturbed—the respondent should have costs on the County Court scale without set-off; and each party should bear his own costs of the appeal.
