and ignore any contract that has not their dishonored name signed to it in full. Men there are who condescend to argue, explain, and, lastly, quibble about legal technicalities, and fairly wallow in the filth of their dishonesty, for the sake of the few dollars involved in a transaction of their own seeking. There is nothing outspoken, open and above board with such men. They deal in premises, which if not found fruitful to their profit, they will fit them to a meaning entirely opposite to the one previously implied, and chuckle over the saving in dollars and cents bartered for their self-respect.

A man's good name never deserts him, while riches obtained through fraud and dishonesty, after proving a curse and a source of misery, usually take into themselves wings and fly away.—Chestnut.
