Our whilom friend was now approaching the age of forty, and was a splendidly preserved bachelor, and not unfair. It had been observed for a year past that Bro. Burton had conceived a distate for his old social habits, spending most of his evenings at home. It was also noticed that those evenings were usually spent with the widow, and many litle coquetries were becoming manifest. The widow, in her younger days, had been one of the reign-ing belles, and at thirty-dre her matured charms were very attractive to our good-natured bachelor. Suffice it to say that Mrs. Elkins became Mrs. Burton. Bro. Burton, who had retired from business, purchased an estate in the suburbs, the boarding-house was relinquished, and they determined to pass their days in peace and comfort.
