HOW DEACON TUBMAN AND THE

PARSON KEPT NEW YEARS.

BY W. H. H. MURRAY.

'Tell the folks that you won't be back ill night,' called the deacon from the leigh, 'for this is New Year and we're going to make a day of it; and he laughed away as heartily as might be—so heartily that the parson joined in the laughter himself as he came shuffling down the icy path toward him. 'Bless me, how much younger I feel already,' he repeated as he settled down into the roomy seat of the old sleigh. 'Only sixteen to-day, eh deacon,' and he nudged him with his elbow.

'That's all; that's all, parson,' answered the deacon gayly, as he nudged him vigorously back; 'that's all we are, either of us, and laughing as merrily as two boys, the two glided away in the sleigh.

'Well, perhaps they didn't have fun that day—these two old boys that had started out with the feeling that they were 'only 16,' and bound to make 'a day of it.' And they did, and he laughed, in fact, and such a day as neither had had for forty years. For first, they went to Bartley's hill, where the boys and girls were coasting, and coasted with them for a full hour, and then it was discovered by a younger portion of his flock that the parson was not an old, stiff, solemn, surly poke, as he had thought, but a pleasant, good-natured, kindly soul, who could take and give a joke and steer a sled as well as the smartest boy in the crowd, and when it came to snow-balling, he could send a ball firmer than Bill Sykes himself, who could outthrow any boy in town, and roll up a bigger block to the new snow fort they were building than any three boys among them. And how the parson enjoyed being a boy again. How exhilarating the slide down the steep hill; how invigorating the pure, cool air; how pleasant the noise of the chatting and joking going on around him; how bright and sweet the boys and girls looked with their rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes, and how the old-parson's heart thrilled as they crowded around him when he would go, and urged him to stay; and little Alice Dorchester begged him, with her little arms around his neck, to 'joe stay and give me one more slide.'

'You never made such a pastoral call as that, parson,' said the deacon, as he drove away amid the cheers of the boys and the 'good-bye's of the girls, while the former fired a volley of snow-balls in his honor, and the latter waved their hands and handkerchiefs after them.

'God bless them,' God bless them!

said the parson. 'They have lifted a load from my heart and brightened the eyes of my youth and the wisdom of Him who took the little ones in his arms and blessed them. Ah, deacon,' he added, 'I've been a great fool, but I'll be thank God, no more.'

Now, old Jack was a horse of a great deal of character, and had a great history, but of this none in that section, said the little deacon, knew a word.

Dick Tubman, the deacon's youngest, wildest and, we might add, favorite son, had purchased him of an impetuous jockey, at the close of, to him, a disastrous campaign, that cleaned him completely out and left him in a strange city, a thousand miles from home, with nothing but a horse, harness and sulky and a list of unpaid bills, the scene of his disaster. Under such circumstances it was that Dick Tubman ran across the horse, and partly out of admirability of the horse, whose failure to win at the races was due more to his lack of condition and the bad management of his jockey than lack of speed, bought him off-hand, and having no use for himself, shipped him as a present to the deacon, with whom he had now been four years, with no better work than plowing out the good old man's corn in the summer and jogging along the country roads on the deacon's errands. Having said such much of the horse, perhaps we should more particularly describe him.

He was, in sooth, an animal of most unique and extraordinary appearance.

For, in the first place, he was quite seventeen hands in height and long in proportion. He was also the reverse of slimly in the fashion of his build, for his head was long and bony and his hip bones sharp and protuberant; his tail was like a wooden horseman as a rat tail, being but scantily covered with hair, and his neck was even more scantily supplied with a mane, while his color he could easily have taken any premium put up for homeliness, being an ashen rind, mottled with flecks and patches of divers hue. But his legs were fast and corded like a racer's, his neck long and thin as a thorough
