LITTLE DREAMERS.

I saw them at night—in the faint fading light
Of a beautiful bright summer's day.
Not a shadow of care had crossed their fair brows.
To darkness life's beautiful ray.
Together they roamed down the bright shining path.
That led to the blue ocean side.
And their joyous young voices in unison rang
Far out o'er the blue dancing tide.
But I saw them no more—there was one standing by.
The couch of a fair dreaming child—
The bright golden curls lay on her fair brow.
She is dead—to her Christ reconciled!
But a Healer was there, who led the lone child.
And pointed with tear-dimmed eye: "Behold!
And she saw far above, in the regions of love,
Her sister enthroned in the skies.
O, then would I say—
Little Dreamer, sleep on!
Thy angels will guard thee,
Sweetly dream on.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.

CHAPTER XVII.

MRS. ALLERTON'S STORY.

What a discovery this was; what emotion and excitement it produced in the minds of Mrs. Allerton and Helen. For some minutes they could do nothing but hold each other's hands in a tight convulsive clasp, and utter exclamations of amazement—and on Helen's part of bewildered inquiry, for, coming upon her utterly unexpected, it came with all the power of an electric shock.
On Mrs. Allerton the effect was not quite so startling or stunning, for it came upon her gradually, at least comparatively so. She had sat down to listen to Helen's tale with a mind which secret sorrow had turned into peculiar sympathy though little did she imagine that it was to appear that her suffering and Helen's proceeded from the same cause—the same crime. At an early point in the narrative, however, the truth dawned upon her, and her agitation and expectation grew apace, till the climax was reached in the bursting avowal that Helen's erring and unfortunate father was her husband's younger brother.

And this was her story to Helen, after the excitement of both had somewhat subsided—a story which we may be sure Helen listened to with intense and absorbed interest. We give it to the reader in Mrs. Allerton's own words:—
I must begin the story, my dear, at a point of time twenty-five years ago, about which period I engaged to become the wife of Percival Allerton, the eldest son of Richard Allerton, Esq., of Allerton Hall. We had known each other from the time my father, Colonel Wintrop, left the army, and came to reside in a Fenton Grange in Herefordshire. The Grange was the family property of the Wintrops, to which my father succeeded on the death of his only and childless brother. Being a widower, and his only child, my father could not suffer me to be separated from him. Therefore, after receiving my education at a boarding school in London, I joined him, and we resided together either in our house, in London, or at those places where his regiment was stationed.

At the time when the Grange came into our possession, and we went to reside there, I was twenty-four years of age. People said I was very handsome; I suppose there must have been some truth in the statement, but, if I was aware of it myself, I don't think it made me very vain. I was not naturally inclined to gaudy, and took little pleasure in the society of the giddy young fellows, into whose company I was naturally much thrown. More than one paid me serious attention, to which nothing in my heart ever responded. Thus it happened that when we took up our abode at the Grange my affections were wholly free. Our property adjoined the larger estate of Allerton Hall, with the inmates of which we soon became on intimate terms. Mr. Allerton's family consisted of his wife, in very feeble health, and two sons Percival and Edwin. Percival was one year my senior, and Edwin was two years younger. In about fifteen months after our coming to the Grange, poor Mrs. Allerton died, and the Square, who had always been rather a cold, stern man, became more stately and stern than ever. His two sons were very different. Percival and Edwin Allerton were generous, high-souled youths, with frank and amiable dispositions. Edwin especially was impulsive, warm-hearted, and full of youthful animation and enthusiasm. Percival being a little older was more staid, and, while equally sincere and generous in his nature, was not so demonstrative. On this account doubtless it was that the cordial feelings with which I regarded both, assumed a more tender character as regarded Percival, and as he too allowed his affections to settle on me, we soon became the truest and fondest of lovers, our two parents seeing the intimacy ripen thus with complacency and approbation.

Edwin I loved with all the pride and fondness of a sister. Oh, Helen, he was a brave bright, handsome youth, just as Bitchie has described him to you. Frank, good natured, warm and generous in feeling, he was the delight of all his acquaintances. No one could resist his radiant face, his beaming eye, his joyous smile, his clear, rich, mellow voice. From meanness and deceit he was altogether free, but I always saw that he was high spirited and strongly independent, and I feared lest a time should come into collision with that of his father. There were grounds for this, because I strongly suspected that his father wished him to marry the daughter of a neighbouring baronet—a lady who, besides being at least four years older than himself, had no qualities likely to attract a youth of Edwin's character and susceptibilities. She had a frigid nature, was proud and formal—in short, was most unsuited to the tastes and tendencies of Edwin Allerton.
