THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XI.

THE TEMPTATION.

CHATTER XI.

A PAR JOURNEY BROOKED ON—S PEEP DEHINDS THE SERVING THE THATA THOS." A PROBACHES.

"NO, Philip." she said with a strange calmaness; "not while this monstrous sligma remains. Before we can be as we have been, my mother's honour must be made clear—ay, clear as noonday."

"Your mother's honour is untouched, is unassailable," cried Philip "Who have better than I, how pure and hely fool is an instruction of the kind!"

"Yet you hear, Philip—you hear that the insinuation has been made, that the damning rumour was circulated?"

"But never for a moment believed," rejoined Philip.
"It must have been believed before it could be uttered," she sadly answered.
"Never—impossible!" calcaimed Mr.
Laugton and Philip in a breath,
"Never—impossible!" calcaimed Mr.
Laugton and Philip in a breath,
"Seep symour believed it, as my sister can testify. And I not speaking the truth Angusta?"

"Oh, Barnard," replied Mrs. Langton, with every appearance of the deepest distress, "I wish you would not appeal to me as to this. If my counis did give any receleance to this. If my counis did give any receleance to this. If my counis did give any receleance to this. If my counis did give any receleance to the reason, it is the would be a proper to the seep seed of the country.

"I cannot believe it—he—her brother," moaned Annabel, "and he could play the hypocrita to not even in his dythe wrong he did my mother!"

"I cannot believe that Seymour had
any such doubt or suspicion," exclaimed
Mr. Langton impulsively, "I saw him frequently during the last week' of his life and he never once breathed it. On the wrong he did my mother?"

"I cannot believe that Seymour had
any such doubt or suspicion," exclaimed
Mr. Langton impulsively, "I saw him
frequently during the last week' of his life and he never once breathed it. On the contrary, lee often speak weith unformed and poignant regret of his errelty to his sister, and with thankful sincertty to his sister, and with thankful sincertty to his sister, and with

will, and it speaks his thoughts pretty plainly."

"Pray, sir," said Philip," did Mr. Seymour direct you to insert the words or did you do it with his full knowledge?"

"That quostion, sir," said Hayes, reddening very much, "contains an insinuation against my honour."

"It does," returned the youth, with fiery emphasis. "But as the clause, in question is interpreted by you do contain an insinuation against the honour of Annabel's mother, a pure and spotless lady whom I knew and loved, I have no scruple in proclaiming my suspicion of yours, and I again ask if Mr Seymour or you are the author of the disgraceful words?"

"You expect me to own to a felony."

words?"
"You expect me to own to a felony, do you?" said Hayes with a speer. "But why should it be so very wonderful that Mr Seymour expressed his will so? Does the result not justify his suspicion? Does the absence of a certificate not show that you mar—"

the absence of a certificate not show that no mar—

"Stop, sir," thundered Philip. "Dare not to give words to the base and devlish slander. No—a thousand times no. The absence of the certificate may be accounted for in various ways. A careful search will no dcubt tend to discover it, but it matters little suppose it should never be found, for the marriage can be proved without it. The records of the church in which it took place will prove it to the satisfaction of the law, though we need no such evidence."

"Very good," said Hayes, with unruffled composure. "As you say, the church record would be cough for the satisfaction of the law. But you speak as if you had no more ado than go straight to the church where such record is to be found. The young lady has algady told us that her mother never named the place of her marriage to her."

Philip started and turned to Aunabel.

He had quite forgotten this. GUELPH

"He says truly," murmured Annabel,
"she never did."

"of course not," added Barnard
