LITTLE VIXEN

"Certainly, my dear girl, I will myself write him a note of invitation," exclaimed Mrs. Douglas, cordially. "If you please," said Dawn, thinking how happy it would make her father to receive a note in the dear, familiar handwriting of his betrothed wife. Mrs. Douglas was quite pleased with the idea. She went eagerly to her desk to write the cordial little note of which Dawn was to be the bearer. Her heart beat with strange excitement as she penned the graceful words; but she dreamed not of the subtle tie that bound her to the man she addressed, nor that his happy tears and kisses would fall together on the perfumed page fresh from the touch of his adored wife. Dawn received it with delight, and impulsively bent her head and kissed her mother's lips. "Thank you ever so much. He will be very proud of this, I know," she said, and then she hurried away, for it was hard to keep her happy secret with those wistful blue eyes looking at her so earnestly. "Patience a little longer, my heart!" she said to herself, feeling her pulses bound in anticipation of swift coming future happiness. Arrived in Washington, she flung herself, with passionate joy, into her father's arms. "I have won!—I have triumphed, as I told you I would!" she cried. "My darling!" he exclaimed, kissing the fair face fondly. "Who could resist your fair face and winsomeness?" "Lettie Jarvis could always," she answered, laughing. "But listen, dear father, I tell you all, I have met Lettie on a fair field, and I have conquered by my own skill—not through the secret I hold. I have won my mother's heart, although she believes that Lettie is her daughter. I have met Mr. and Mrs. Tempest, and they are my friends; they have learned to like me before they learn that I am daughter to the man and woman they wronged so deeply. "That is well, my daughter," he said, smiling, and softly pinching the rosy cheek with his fond, caressing fingers. "But, after all, it was an easy victory. As I said before, no one could resist you. But what of Tracy Tempest?" "His sweet face, flushing warmly, dropped from his gaze. Mr. Douglas laughed lightly at her swift confusion. "Is Tracy conquered and won, too?" he inquired; and Dawn whispered a shy affirmative against his cheek. "Then the grand finale will come soon," he said, hopefully; and for answer she gave him her mother's letter.

CHAPTER XLII.

His dark cheek flushed, and paled at the familiar writing. Tears of joy dimmed his eyes as he kissed the words her hand had penned. "Now I will tell you my plan," said Dawn, eagerly. "I will go with Mrs. Elmore to Cedarhurst next week. You will follow the day after I leave. I do not want to be hard on Lettie. I shall have a private interview with her, tell her all, and let her withdraw quietly to her father's house, so as to escape the reproaches of the people she has deceived; and I shall give her some money and tell her I forgive her, and she must ask God to forgive her too, for her sin—will not that be right, dear father?" "I will be kinder than she deserves; but, after all, we owe her some kindness, for if she had not locked you up in the old wing of Cedarhurst, your poor mother might have remained in prison to the day of her death," he replied thoughtfully. It was the last day of August when Dawn and Mrs. Elmore arrived at Cedarhurst, which was looking its loveliest in the full flush of its summer glory. The splendid lawn was all aglow with brilliant flowers set like gems in the emerald green grass. The magnificent cedars that gave the place its distinctive name were looking their grandest, and Dawn felt that it was no wonder that Mr. Tempest had coveted such a noble inheritance for his handsome son. They received a cordial welcome from Mrs. Douglas, whose sweet, sad face relaxed into smiles at sight of her favorite Dawn. "I hope you will like Cedarhurst," she said, when Mrs. Elmore expressed her delight with the beauties of the place. Then she sent a servant to show them their rooms, saying that Aurora had gone out for a drive with Tracy, and would be delighted to find them here on her return. Dawn felt rather strangely as she went to her room, realizing that this grand house was hers by right of birth. "And yet this is only the second time I ever came beneath its roof," she thought, and memory recalled the bright May day, now more than two years ago, when she had come with Lettie to sit to Herbert Arden for their portraits. Out of the eyes of that day what strange complications had arisen. She had rescued her unknown mother from her long imprisonment, and found her father; yet Lettie, the beautiful impostor, was here queening it in her staid as heiress of Cedarhurst, betrothed to Tracy Tempest, soon to be his wife. "It is time the farce should end," Dawn said to herself, decidedly. "I shall speak to Lettie today, but I will make her disappointment as easy as I can. It will be hard for her to give up all, I know."

She could not help feeling sorry for Lettie, who loved Tracy Tempest so well, and had so utterly failed to win his heart, even with all the advantages of great wealth and glowing beauty. "Yet he loved me when I was only simple little Vixen Jarvis," she thought with proud delight, as she stood at the window of the elegant room and looked out over the beautiful scene spread before her eyes, her gaze lingering tenderly on the spire of the little church where Tracy had offered to her such chivalrous grace to make her his wife. Her young heart beat with pardonable triumph as she wondered what the Sunnyside people, who had treated her so badly, would say when they found out that she was heiress of Cedarhurst, and that she was going to be the wife of handsome Tracy Tempest, who had crowned her Queen of May upon the green lawn when she was but a simple village maiden.

"Miss Dawn, honey, is you gwine stand dreamin' all day at de window, in yous trabelin' dress?" demanded old Aunt Phebe at this juncture. "Oh, Aunt Phebe, I forgot I had to dress!" the girl exclaimed, turning from the window with a smile. The maid had already opened her trunk and laid out several handsome dresses; but Dawn took out the plainest white dress she had—a white mull, soft and dainty, but simply made, with white ruchings of lace at the throat and wrists, and a knot of blue ribbon falling from her shoulder. She arranged her abundant shining hair in much the same simple fashion that she used to wear it two years ago. [To be Continued.]

PROHIBITION IN MANITOBA

No Fees To Be Charged Druggists and No Limit on Doctors' Prescriptions.

Winnipeg, June 28.—The prohibition bill was considered by the law amendments committee of the legislature, and several important alterations made in its provisions. Section 3 was amended by striking out the words "or as a lodging house," so that no restriction be placed on lodging or apartment houses and blocks. The definition of a "dwelling house," which provided that it should not be construed to include or mean "any house or building with a regular sale of liquor warehouse mentioned in section 54 of this act," was also struck out on motion of Mr. Steele, as it was thought to be too drastic. Clauses 7 and 8, providing for payment of license fees by wholesale and retail druggists, were both struck out, the committee deciding that no fees should be charged, but at the same time that licenses must be obtained by the druggists, and that a medical practitioner should not be limited as to the amount of liquor he should prescribe, and it was pointed out that the provision would prove troublesome and annoying in country districts. The question of the sale of ale and porter was also raised, and it was asked whether a sick person could drink either beverage in a boarding house. It was thought that under the act it would be impossible. Mr. McInnis remarked that the veterinary surgeons and dentists also required to use large quantities of liquor in their practice, and he moved that they be given the power to keep and administer it. Mr. Greenwood thought that if persons were allowed to give animals large quantities of liquor they would often have sick horses. The clause was ordered to be redrafted so that there shall be no limit in the prescription of medical men, and also that "vets" and dentists shall prescribe and administer liquor.

Clause 43 was also amended, so that ministers of the gospel requiring wine for sacramental purposes shall obtain it from druggists on written request instead of affidavit, and the amount to be unlimited. In this connection it was pointed out that an amendment would have to be made to the act to permit the drinking of wine in churches, otherwise a whole congregation might be arrested for infractions. TELL THE DEAF.—Mr. J. F. Kellock, druggist, Perth, writes: "A customer of mine having been cured of deafness by the use of Dr. Thomas' Electric Oil, wrote to Ireland, telling his friends there of the cure. In consequence I received an order to send a dozen by express to Wexford, Ireland, this week."

The crops in Grey and Bruce counties are reported to look better this year than they have in any previous year. Peas are especially good; they have already grown as high as a man's waist. The wheat crop is also most promising. This is the information brought down by a traveler from Owen Sound.

Sunday afternoon Mr. Alex. Murray, of the Huron road, Stratford, met with a very serious accident. While out driving a couple of miles from that place, his horse got one leg entangled in the harness and started to make things lively. Mr. Murray was jolted out, and his right leg was broken below the knee.

The residence of Mr. John Walker, Petrolia, was the scene of an extremely pleasant event Tuesday, when his eldest daughter, Miss Edith, was joined in wedlock to Mr. A. D. Armstrong, son of John Armstrong, Bridgeton. The ceremony was performed by Rev. A. C. Graham at high noon. Miss Emma Walker was bridesmaid and Mr. W. Dawson groomsmen.

The death took place in Stratford on Monday of one of that city's most esteemed residents, John Dutton, aged 74, who for many years carried on a drug business there. His aged wife predeceased him about six weeks ago, dying at the Woodstock College. Mr. Dutton leaves two sons and five daughters, one of the latter being the wife of Dr. Browett, optician.

On Monday afternoon Joseph Brennan, son of John Brennan, Carter, Chatham, was drowned in the Thames at the foot of First street, that city. After school a number of boys went swimming at the scene of the accident. The two Brennan boys and a little fellow named Taylor could not swim, but were playing on two logs in the water. Joseph Brennan got beyond his depth in a deep place, but was brought out by the other boys, and warned to keep away from the dangerous spot. He seems to have returned to it again, and was drowned.
