CHAPTER VIII.

Towards the end of the evening the rumor of the engagement got about. Mrs. Strangeways had been to'd by the young couple, and there was no need that they should keep it secret. Congratulations, at first only hinted at lest the rumor should be a mistake, were now fully and freely proffered. Mrs. Woburn stopped the young couple as they waltzed round the so proud, so bright and happy that it almost seemed sorrow never could touch her.

Well, fate is surely a woman," Mrs. Woburn returned. "She must be, sne would not distribute her favors with so little discrimination. Women are supposed to be jealous of one another. It seems to me one might well be jealous of you.'

"Because I am to be Philip's wife?" "Because all good things-all that you-wish for-come to you. I confess, Leslie, I never like to see anyone lifting a cup to their lips which seems to have in it not one bitter drop. I have often seen it dashed away before the precious draught is taken. I'm an old roker, I know, but try, try not to be Leslie looked up at her love, and the beautiful eyes were brim full of love.

"How can I help it?" she anwered. "I am indeed the happiest woman in the world, and the money has nothing-nothing whatever to do with it. The same happiness would have been mine tonight if I had not had it, and so long as fate leaves me Philip. I must be happy, and he will be mine while we both live. But we do not expect to walk through life, though it will be hand-in-hand, with-out troubles, do we, Philip? Only love will lighten them. Don't be afraid for us, please, Mrs. Woburn, even fear for one's happiness seems to bring the ghost—the shadow of a sorrow."
"Then I will not," she murmured. "I would not, for anything, bring you even so little sadness as that. I would like your life to be all sunshine, only She left them, and once again Philip drew his sweetheart from the merry, dancing throng. 'Mrs. Woburn is a little bit gloomy,"

"She is a widow," Leslie answered. That seemed quite enough to her to make a woman sad all her life. To have lost someone who was even more than a lover-a husband-it would be terrible indeed! He drew her to his heart and kissed her.

"Darling, darling!" he whispered "Ch, Leslie dearest, I hope I shall make you very, very happy." She lifted her lips and kissed him back, half boldly, half shyly. He was hers to kiss, if she wished. The pride that made her bold. He was so newly her affianced husband, that made her shy. "I do more than that" she whispered. "I know; but, Philip, tell me-you won't mind telling me, I know, and don't think, don't, my dearest, that it is jealously that makes me ask the question, only a woman likes to be the best loved—is it true that no love is like a man's first love?" He drew her closer to him. A little tiny thrill of fear ran through his heart. Had someone already been try-ing to poison her mind against him? "Quite true," he answered, and she shrank a little, but he drew her back. "A boy's first love is a midsummer madness, an almost childish fever that if the love leads to marriage, it is renerally not well for either husband wife. In a boy's first love there is stability; it is the later love of a etime that is the real, true love. 'st love comes but once in a man's time that love captivates him art, body and soul, satisfies all his senses, all his intellectual attributes-

a love like mine, my dearest." She put one arm round his neck, she looked up into his eyes. "And it isn't true, is it, that a man always tires of a woman when he has won all? Oh, Philip, Philip, say it isn't, because, my dearest, you've won all, I love you so dearly.' "It's a lie!" he answered. "Who has been putting these thoughts in your head? Someone who does not like me -an enemy."

"No, indeed, a friend. He did

"I understand, darling," he answered. "But I mistrust such a friend. Be-lieve me, Leslie I never have loved, heiress, and to become an engaged lt is almost more than love, it is worgiri within so snort a time! Isn't it ship. Who was it put these doubts in your mind?"

She looked up reproachfully. 'Doubts! Oh, Philip!" He smiled a little.

'We don't call it a doubt then, darling, but who was it?" She was silent a moment before she answered him.

"I think, perhaps, I ought not to tell," she answered, "because I am sure he meant well. He spoke, oh. more than kindly of you. Philip. He said he loved you. A man would not try to injure another if he loved him, Jasper, I am sure, meant what he

The name slipped out unawares. Philip frowned a little. "So it was Jasper, was it?" he said. "Didn't you notice, dearest, that you let the name slip out? Well, I don't agree with you, I don't think Jasper loves me, though we are cousins. He would love me better, perhaps, if we

"Because you, not he, may be your uncle's heir?" "Because we may be co-heirs, I think. I wonder how Jasper knew anything about that foolish fancy of my youth. I thought no one knew of

She laughed softly, quizzically. "Someone always knows of everything," she answered. "There is no such thing as a secret in this world, but surely he knew her, or of her? He must have, since he knew her name.'

"Her name?" Carline, that was her name, was it not?" "Yes," he answered, "that was her name. But I do not understand how Jasper knew it. I never mentioned her to him, and he never knew her. Still, things leak out, of course. Dearest, shall we forget all that and never speak of it again? It is a part of my life which is turned over-done with. There is no need to look back upon it."
"Yes," she answered. "Why should we worry with the past when we have present and future?"

But the back pages of our lives are seldom done with. Often, against our will, they lie open before us! (To be Continued.)

THE MEDICOS AT STRATHROY. HE HOSPITALITY of the Strathroy

hockey team and of the residents of that town generally will be a pleasant remembrance to the Medical School students of London and their friends. It is doubtful if a more enjoyable time could have been spent than was put in there last night. When the Medical School hockey team arranged a game with Strathroy, it was thought that the match would be of the routine order, and that the Meds would beat Strathroy and there end it. The Strathroy people announced, however, that the locals would be treated well and would be met by a reception committee and band. At this the Meds determined to bring as many friends as they could with them to hold up London's part in making the affair pleasant. Such a surprise as the Strathroy people gave the boys is fully appreciated by those who attended. In fact it is rather out of place to use sporting columns to report this event. It was quite as much a social function as a sporting one. Should any London team want to go to a place where they will, be treated right, they should not overlook Strathroy. The police force locked itself in for the night and a large number of Strathroy's prominent citizens turned out to welcome the

A fast special train, which was secured by the Meds, left the G. T. R. station about 7 o'clock. It carried fully 150 local hockey enthusiasts. On its arrival at Strathroy a procession, headed by an excellent brass band, was organized, and for a quarter of an hour the Meds paraded the town, many people gathering on the streets to see them.

A large number of Strathroy people had preceded the Londoners to the rink. The game immediately com-menced, and was a speedy and wellcontested match. Inside of two minutes both teams had scored a goal and at the close of the first half the score stood 3 to 3. The teams were very evenly matched. What the Strathrovs lacked in combination work they almost made un for in heavy checking and much individual play. The match was rough and time after time players were heavily thrown against the sides. There was little combination, but in spite of this the game was very teresting to the spectators. The whole rink cheered when good plays were made and a spirit of friendline's existed throughout. The Meds. after countless rushes, scored two goals in the second half. The last was scored shortly before time was called, making | to 1. the score 5 to 3 in London's favor. Chester McGuffin, Adams and Mc-Mahen scored the goals. All the players conducted themselves well. although the home team was rather too forcible their methods at times. No illfeeling arose from it. Both of the defenses were exceptionally good and the forwards were equally effective. The line-up:

The members of both teams and their friends were dined by Strathroy in a manner which will cause them to remember it above ordinary affairs. The order of things was altogether different from that of the ordinary banquet. A toast list and musical programme was given. In replying to the toasts, Strathroy was impressed with the gratitude which the local men felt for Strathroy's treatment of the locals. It was hoped that a return visit would be paid and that such cordial re'ations might always exist. The Strathroy and Imperial Male Quartet of London contributed excellent musical numbers. In many instances the visitors were individually entertained by their opponents. The return train left Strathroy at 1 o'clock. FAST GAME TONIGHT. The locals expect to win, as they have played one game in Ailsa Craig already, so that they will be familiar with the rink. The lineup will be: Goal, Kennedy; point, F. TORONTO GETS TOFT. Toronto, Jan. 22. - President Applegath, of the Toronto ball club, re-ceived notice today from Secretary Farrell, of the National Association of Minor Leagues, that the board of arbitration had awarded Catcher Jack Toft to the Toronto club. Toft, it seems, signed contracts with both the Toronto club and the Columbus club, of the American Association. The evidence showed, however, that he had signed the Toronto contract first, and it was therefore decided that he should play with the locals during 1903. In of the Toronto ball club of 1903, he will for the present. manage the team from the bench, although he would keep in condition, and, if necessary, take a turn in the box. It is not likely that Gardner will sign with Toronto unless Manager Barrow has made him a good offer to join the Detroit club.
