Yet Dame Melba sang it with all the romance, the charm, the appeal that might be bestowed upon it by a young singer, staking her all upon this one great test. With years of success piled up behind her, Melba remains ageless. As she sings she is a girl for a woman. VOICE OF MELBA
THRILLS AUDIENCE

She seems to have that one great delightful thing from commencement to making a concert a delightful thing from commencement to making a concert and thing the concert and the seems of the season of the seaso

Interesting Personalities.

The Melba concert party included, with Melba herself, three immensely interesting personalities. With her were Mr. Miquelle, 'cellist, and the Prince Alexis Obolensky. In addition to the perfection of his accompaniments, Melba drew attention to the pianist, Carl Lamson. At the end of three of her songs (if one may use the term of so great a lady) she "grabbed" her pianist, drawing him to his feet, as if to say to her audience, that they, no matter how retiring he might be, must recognize his to his feet, as if to say to her audi-ence, that they, no matter how retir-ing he might be, must recognize his ence, that they, no matter how retiring he might be, must recognize his talent.

As Prince Alexis Obolensky commenced to sing, it seemed that he should be standing in the crystal and gold of a. European drawing-room, and that the only applause which might greet him might be that of restrained and gloved hands. But as he sang he verged into a more pleasant intimacy with his hearers, until his later numbers and encores, sung in impeccable English (and with an enunciation far superior to that of many English singers), became nothing short of a triumph. The songs he chose in English were charming, and his voice as melodious and vibrant as an organ tone.

Cellist Unique.

The cellist was unique. Here indeed seemed the stroke of genius. Mr. Miquelle is a tall man, with narrow level brows, a thin straight mouth, features, in fact, which as he plays have the appearance of a mask, this curiously emphasized by his habit of playing with his eyes closed. As the house showed its appreciation, however, of his remarkable playing, the mask vanished, and one had a glimpse of a fascinating and friendly smile, the friendliness doubly displayed in the aptitude with which he chose his the friendliness doubly displayed in angel of his dreams will go mighty the aptitude with which he chose his hard for the angel when the first

Of the entire affair, there was but mad infatuation wears off.

While Cellini, in real life, as well one disappointing feature, and this, as in the play, boasted of his genius one disappointing reature, and this, though it distressed Melba greatly, was the fault of no one. dience, who showed no intention of leaving, even when she herself had come to the fore and insisted "No more." Thus it was that "God Save the King" was not played, as the audience leaft spasmodically, some getting to the aisles, and there standing in the hope that the singer would relent. But it was not to be. She has a long journey before her, until she reaches that other great dominion of the empire where her home is. There was a mute "God Save the King" at the conclusion of her convenience, that gives him world renown. It is the famous book written by himself from which "The Heart of Cellini" is taken.

With these two splendid stars and the effectiveness with which the entire film is worked out, "To the Last Man" is worth seeing.

"The Flying Henrys" are the outstanding feature of the vaudeville. Their concluding stunt creates quite a thrill on the part of the audience. The whole act is spiced with the unusual, and is consequently interesting.

"Ladd and Morgan" are the head-liners, their act being only slightly marred by the introduction of "blue" songs, which aren't indispensable. The featured dances are charming, indeed. The concluding ensemble is a pretty bit of work which is entirely satisfying, all four, of the dancers pretty bit of work which is entirely satisfying, all four of the dancers being nimbly graceful.
