

evening was devoted to a free discussion on the work in its various phases, and helpful suggestions made. Two weeks succeeding this meeting we had the pleasure of listening to an exceedingly interesting address by Rev. John Craig. He expressed the hope that in the near future he might see many of the faces before him as co-laborers in the work.

One bright Saturday afternoon, a party of Third-flatters, escorted by two of the Faculty, set out on a trip to Lewiston. There were nine of us all told, not to mention the lunch-baskets and wraps, of which there was a goodly number. When we got down to the wharf we found the deck of the boat already crowded, but, acting upon the principle of "always room for one more in a street-car," we made our way on deck. As there were no chairs to be had upstairs, and as the gentlemen of our party were invisible, half of the party rushed downstairs for chairs, while the other half kept places for them upstairs. At last the moment for departure came, and with joyous eye we watched the receding landscape, and left Moulton and its cares far behind us. Some read, some admired the view, and all laughed and enjoyed themselves generally. So passed the time until Niagara-on-the-Lake was reached. We paused there a short time, and then came a most delightful sail up the river. At Lewiston we had our lunch and lots of fun. Coming home it grew decidedly colder, and we all huddled together, talking of nothings. Being a very musical crowd, some of us started to sing, but were soon reminded by our "Faculty" that the night air was injurious to high sopranos (the girls have often wondered if they really meant it or if our singing made them homesick.) As we neared Toronto we gained the very front of the boat, and came in where Moulton girls always should, at the head of all. One other bright Saturday afternoon a week later, a crowd (not Third-flatters), set out for Lewiston, but upon reaching the wharf and seeing the boat a short distance out, decided that the Island had more charms for them than Niagara could ever have.

WOODSTOCK COLLEGE.

THE Philomathic and Excelsior Societies have been both started anew, the officers elected and everything done that may tend to make these Societies of interest and instruction. As usual the Excelsior outnumbers the Philomathic.

At our Thursday evening prayer meeting, September 22nd, we had the pleasure of listening to a graphic account of Armenia, both as to its history, and present religious condition, delivered by a native of that country. His dress, and description of the manners of his native land, were interesting and amusing.

THE football team has been organized and under its captain, J. W. Hay, is doing some very good work. We think it will give a
