> As for the story that the ship stopped when entering the fog, he cited the latest marine cases in England, as proof of his contention that it was Captain Kendall's duty to do this before he entered the fog and not after he had buried his vessel in the cloud. There was no reason why. Captain Kendall should lie, for if the steering gear was wrong it was the fault of the owners of the liners and not of the master in charge. If his ship had failed the captain would have said so. They had to remember southeast. They had to remember that the ship sank rapidly and could that the ship sank rapidly and could not have got more than a few ship lengths away from where she was hit.
