

which must prevail in every pious and well ordered mind, of the great importance of the benevolent work to which, according to our ability, we are lending our humble efforts. If we are Christians more than in name, we must think and feel as Christians, and if we have brought ourselves to think and feel as Christians, we shall never be backward in acting as Christians.

"I take it for granted that our assembling here is a proof of the sincerity of our Christian profession, and I congratulate the Society that in this infant Colony, so lately redeemed from the wilderness, adequate evidence is afforded of the same holy zeal which is at this moment engaging the Christian world in one common cause.

"Indeed it is matter of surprize by what arguments those can satisfy their consciences who abstain from uniting in the pious work of distributing the Holy Scriptures. To most or certainly to many other charitable and benevolent institutions, objections may be raised plausible enough, and to a certain extent, just in some instances. It may be said, and is often urged, that by too readily relieving want, we are encouraging idleness; and often no doubt the exertions of the humane have only the effect of tending to prolong an existence, which crime or disease has rendered miserable or irksome; but surely it is not questionable whether good or evil results from disseminating the treasures of divine knowledge. The Scriptures are given to man as his guide to eternal happiness; if therefore our exertions to place that instruction within every person's reach are at all successful, that success is infinite in its value. If one soul be saved by it, it is saved from the endurance of eternal misery. If one soul be made blest by it, it is made blest in the enjoyment of never ending happiness.

"The object is beyond all price. It may be said all this we know; we feel the necessity of religious instruction, we know the good that may be done by extending it. Then let us remember it is said in the Holy Writings, "If ye know these things happy are ye if ye do them," and let us take to ourselves the inevitable consequence if we know these things, guilty are we if we do them not.

"But among the most important temporal benefits that may be expected from the zealous union of different Christian nations in spreading the Gospel through all lands, is the community of Christian feeling which such exertions must produce. The Gospel they are thus extending is the
